The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. How much more time is there left under the order closing debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Eight minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS]. The committee has failed to advance one single logical reason why they should reduce the number of suboffices from 140 to 50.

This admirable bill has gone a long step forward in decentralization by establishing 14 regional offices, but it has reversed itself completely by doing away with the 140 offices and reducing the number to 50, and unless they can advance some sound reason we should insist on the number of 140 as carried in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND]. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] and the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I am for the amendment of the gentleman from California to this bill. I had the same amendment prepared and ready to offer, and since he has offered that amendment I withhold mine and support his. It occurs to me that all this talk about 14 regional offices and all this talk about suboffices, and so on, would not amount to much if we are going to do away with the powers of those offices. I am in favor of plenty of suboffices, with authority to make compensation and insurance awards and to grant vocational training. [Applause.] It looks to me like we ought to carry this thing as close to the soldier as we can get it, and if we create the proper number of suboffices with proper power to carry on under this bill, with full authority to transmit the proofs, evidence, and findings directly to the central office in Washington, where it can be looked after by the Congressman and Senator, we know that the ex-service man is going to get speedy relief. But when you go around to the four corners of the United States and send the poor wounded man's papers hither and thither to a lot of different agencies which have to make copies of them, with the record to be attended to, then you know it is going to be a long time before the soldier is going to get relief. I am in favor of this bill just like these soldiers want it, like their leaders drew the bill. If it is a mistake, it is their mistake. We can correct it in the future.

It may be that after trying it out for a year the American Legion will see some errors in this law and will want it changed; then Congress can amend it and remedy all defects.

These soldiers did the fighting, and their views on this legislation for the benefit of ex-service men who were in anywise disabled should receive the most careful consideration of this body. I have stood for their rights all the time and shall continue to fight for them. They are not satisfied with this very section 6 of this bill, and I am in favor of changing it to the original language used in the bill prepared by the officers of the American Legion.

Every Member of this House desires to do what is best for these poor disabled soldiers. Then why not give them this law in the form and language which their leaders request?

Mr. VOLK. Mr. Chairman, I merely rise to ask to have read into the RECORD this telegram.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 7, 1921.

Capt. EDWIN S. BETTELHEIM, Jr.,
Chairman National Legislative Committee,
Veterans of Foreign Wars,
319 Metropolitan Bank Building, Washington, D. C.:

We believe lines 9, 10, and 11, page 5, section 6, House bill 6611, should be eliminated or bill be amended to increase branch offices to at least 150. Cutting down number of local offices will hinder rather than help situation. This is consensus of opinion from wires to national headquarters received from various State departments and local posts.

ELTON,
Adjutant General Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized to close the debate.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks a general request of that sort is not in order in the committee.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has been my duty to follow the development of this bill for many months. I have been intimately connected with its development and the testimony given before the subcommittee during the recent period when this bill was being drawn. I have listened to the debate up to this moment, and it appears very clear to me that there are but two features of it which are attracting any particular attention worthy of considerable notice. Those features are, first, the question of the number of suboffices. The second question is what authority these suboffices may finally have. The subcommittee which drew this bill and the full committee which canvassed and finally approved it are of one mind in regard to the great importance of the two considerations which I have named. Let us refer to the question of authority. We have here a business proposition, an executive consideration. The working of this bill under the provisions proposed in section 6 is, after all, the one thing we should consider. There is more or less filling in the bill, but the working of it is the real thing. It has been clear to the subcommittee and to the full committee and clear to those who represented the Divisions of Public Health, War Risk Insurance, and Vocational Rehabilitation that a small body of offices in authority would represent the most desirable state of things, and it is natural that all these should come to that conclusion. Anybody who has ever had executive authority and responsibility of direction on anything approaching a large scale knows that the more a single authority is divided the worse the execution. We have provided for a small number of suboffices, which we thought would best do the work. The committee is not hidebound as to 50 offices in contrast with 40, as to 50 in contrast with 60 or 70 or 75, or any other reasonable number.

Mr. CHALMERS rose.

Mr. WINSLOW. No, thank you; I can not give way now, as the time rolls on; later, if you please. We desire to get before the country an organization which will do the work best. We advocate centralized power. The bill is bristling with suggestions of determination to centralize the executive power. The chief director will have tremendous authority, far beyond that ever given, maybe, to any other department head in the United States. Now, to handicap him with an organization which will divide his authority would be only to offer a thousand and one opportunities for differences of opinion, differences in interpretation of regulations, and so forth, and with correspondingly bad results. We ought not to make these offices too many and too near the soldier for this reason, and I speak not sentimentally at all, but from a business point of view: If you should make as many offices as some people would have, with suboffices in every town, in every county, maybe, from the very nature of things the directors of these suboffices, instead of helping wisely, might most naturally be listening to the pleas of their neighbors, of their friends, to the plea of the mother for her boy, to the plea of the girl for her sweetheart, and so on down a long line covering all relationships which might naturally affect men locally. If we were to have too large a number of suboffices it would be unfortunate, in my opinion, and the committee had such thought in their mind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND of Indiana: Page 5, line 10, after the word "exceeding," strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and forty."

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from West Virginia an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I have an original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to offer that later. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 95, noes 77.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, may I state a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I was under the impression that the substitute for the section would be voted upon before an amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in error about that. It is in order at first to perfect the text of the original bill. The question is on taking the vote by tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WINSLOW and Mr. BLAND of Indiana took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: Page 5, line 24, after the word "training," insert a new paragraph as follows:

"The regional offices and suboffices, with all authority to establish such offices, shall terminate on June 30, 1926, and upon such termination the records and supplies pertaining thereto shall be delivered to the central office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MACGREGOR: Page 5, strike out lines 22, 23, and 24 after word "office" and insert: "The suboffices shall have the power to make temporary compensation and to grant temporary vocational training pending final determination by the regional office, and shall have such other powers as may be delegated to them by the director."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 5, line 14, strike out the sentence beginning on line 14 and ending on line 22 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Such regional offices shall, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the director, have the power to hear complaints, to examine, rate, and award compensation claims; to grant medical, surgical, dental, hospital, and convalescent care and necessary and reasonable aftercare; to make insurance awards; to grant vocational training; and, if delegated to them by the director, may exercise such other powers as could be performed lawfully under this act by the central office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANKIN: Page 5, line 9, after the word "Columbia," strike out the words, "and not more than 14 regional offices"; and in line 14, same page, after the word "act," strike out down to and including the word "office" in line 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RANKIN) there were—ayes 21, noes 78.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEEDY: Page 5, line 14, after the word "act," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided, however, That in States now having but a single suboffice no such suboffice shall be abolished within five years next following the approval of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LINEBERGER: Page 5, lines 23 and 24, after the word "director," strike out the words "except to make compensation and insurance awards and to grant vocational training."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LINEBERGER) there were—ayes 34, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further perfecting amendments?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer to strike out 50 suboffices and insert in lieu thereof 100.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 5, line 10, after the word "exceeding," strike out the word "fifty" and insert the words "one hundred."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order, because it is only in order as an amendment to the Bland amendment or as an amendment to the substitute. That having been voted upon, and the amendment having been defeated, there can not now be offered a separate increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will permit. Following the line of argument advanced by my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], this proposal was passed upon by Speaker Clark on a bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in which it was proposed on a motion to recommit to offer a germane amendment broader in scope than the proposition that had previously been voted down. The debate was participated in by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and others, and the matter was of considerable political significance.

The Speaker, after consideration, decided that as the matter had been once under consideration it could not then be subsequently brought to the attention of the House; that the time for voting on it was when it was before the committee.

We have had here pending an amendment to increase these suboffices to 140. That was the amendment. It was at any time within the power of any member of this committee to have offered an amendment to that amendment increasing or reducing the number, so as to obtain the judgment of this committee. No person saw fit to offer such an amendment when it was up for consideration.

The basis of that ruling, I take it, is the proposition that we should expedite the consideration of amendments. If the amendment of the gentleman is now in order to increase the number to 100, and this committee votes that down, then again, right afterwards, some person may offer an amendment to increase the number to 200, and that might be voted down, or to 300, and that might be voted down, and the time of the committee would be taken up continuously without any opportunity to terminate the voting on that amendment.

It would be a means of preventing the consideration of this bill by one person alone offering amendments with different numbers for suboffices that would prevent consideration of the bill. That is the philosophy, I take it, of the ruling of Speaker Clark and other presiding officers against allowing an amendment of the same nature to be considered when it has once been voted upon. If the Chair wants that ruling as referred to in the Manual, I can call it to the attention of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to have the citation.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. If this amendment had been offered after we had proceeded from that paragraph to another paragraph, it certainly would not have been in order. But we had been discussing this paragraph under debate limited to one hour, and the Chair held that all amendments were in order under that paragraph, no matter at what time they were introduced, and therefore I contend that this amendment is in order, and properly so.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Chair will recognize that if he can give me a few minutes I shall be able to supply the citation. I have had occasion only a short time ago to look up that decision and read the opinion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at length, and I also called the decision to the attention of the parliamentary clerk, Mr. Fess.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin is mistaken as to the ruling of Speaker Clark. I think the ruling was that when an amendment had been agreed to it could not afterwards be changed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. I have read that ruling within two weeks.

Mr. DOWELL. It was a ruling where an amendment had been agreed to. But where no amendment has been adopted it seems to me this is clearly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would have been in order when the original proposition was pending to amend that amendment by a further amendment or by a substitute. That was not done. If it had been done, the Chair thinks it would then have been in order to offer a further amendment. But the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana having been voted down, the Chair thinks it is in order to offer another amendment not substantially the same as that already voted on. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by making it 75 instead of 100.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by making it 200—no; I move to strike out "75" and make it "125."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi, without objection, modifies his amendment.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the substitute as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANKIN to the substitute offered by Mr. ROGERS: Strike out "75" and in lieu thereof insert "125."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi to the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a division demanded?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the substitute, to make it 250.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will have to be recognized first.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for recognition, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if it will be permissible to offer an amendment to line 10, to strike out the word "exceeding" and insert in lieu thereof the words "not less than"?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will offer his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to amend the substitute by making it "250."

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. It has not been reported, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD to the substitute: To strike out "75" and insert "250."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is delaying purposely without good faith the action of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in writing and is not in order on that account.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAYBURN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York is not in order, not having been submitted in written form.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in error upon that and withdraws the decision. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment to the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOODYKOONTZ to the substitute offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 5, line 10, after the word "suboffices," strike out "not exceeding 50 in number."

Mr. ROGERS. I make the point of order that that is not a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question now recurs upon the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] for the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The question being taken, the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. BEGG. May we have that reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 5, line 10, after the word "exceeding," strike out "50" and insert in lieu thereof "100."

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FISH) there were—ayes 77, noes 93.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is "delaying the proceedings of the House." [Laughter.]

Mr. McSWAIN. It is delay, but in good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. FISH and Mr. ROGERS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 106.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further perfecting amendments——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers a perfecting amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, there is a substitute pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that a perfecting amendment has precedence over the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 5, line 14, after the word "act," strike out the period, add a colon and the following words: "Provided, That one of such suboffices shall be located in each of the several States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 44, noes 81.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, on page 5, to strike out all of line 10 after the word "offices," to strike out all of lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, down to and including the period.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG: Page 5, line 10, after the word "offices," strike out all the remainder of line 10 and all of lines 11, 12, and 13, and all of line 14 down to and including the word "act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE: Page 5, line 8, strike out all of section 6 and insert:

"SEC. 6. The director shall establish a central office in the District of Columbia and such suboffices within the territory of the United States, not exceeding 140 in number, as he may deem necessary for the best interests of the work committed to the veterans' bureau and to carry out the purposes of this act. Such suboffices shall have such powers as may be delegated to them by the director for hearing complaints and for examining, rating, and awarding compensation claims, granting medical, surgical, dental, and hospital care, convalescent care, and necessary and reasonable aftercare, making insurance awards, granting vocational training, and all other matters delegated to them by the director as could be performed lawfully under this act by the central office.

"Provided, however, That an appeal to the central office may be had from the findings of the suboffice by the ex-service man under such rules and regulations as the director may prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McDUFFIE) there were—ayes 43, noes 88.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAYTON: Page 5, line 8, strike out all of section 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the director shall establish a central office in Washington, D. C., and not more than 14 regional offices and such suboffices within the territory of the United States and its outlying possessions as may be deemed necessary by him and in the best interests of the work committed to the veterans' bureau and to carry out the purposes of this act. Any such regional office or suboffice may exercise such powers, including the establishment of agencies for hearing complaints and for examining, rating, and awarding compensation claims, granting medical, surgical, dental, and hospital care, convalescent care, insurance awards, pension awards, and all other matters delegated to these agencies by the director as could be performed lawfully under this act by the central office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Delaware for the section.

The question being taken, the substitute was rejected.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LINEBERGER: Page 5, lines 23 and 24, after the word "director," strike out "except to make compensation and insurance awards and to grant vocational training," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "through the regional office in whose jurisdiction the suboffice is located."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 10, strike out the word "exceeding" and insert the words "less than."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, can I not explain my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this section and all amendments thereto has been exhausted.

Mr. SPEAKS. I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the time having been fixed by the committee, he ought not to entertain requests for unanimous consent. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. The beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education shall hereafter be the beneficiaries of the veterans' bureau.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 4, after the word "bureau," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "and a complete individual record of each beneficiary shall be kept by the veterans' bureau."

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered provides that the veterans' bureau shall keep complete individual records of each beneficiary under this law.

That such explicit direction is necessary has been proven by our experience during the past two years.

Congress has appropriated the money to meet every request of the Vocational Educational Board and the amounts have reached the total of $200,000,000.

The money is being expended, but without the attempt to keep individual records. These expenditures are simply totaled in certain classifications, and it is impossible to determine the cost of the training given any individual service man in the United States.

When the estimates were sent to the Appropriation Committee at the last hearing there was a table submitted showing that the estimated cost per trainee is $160. This was reported to be distributed as follows:

	Average.
Administration:
Salaries	$10.48
Travel expenses	.93
Subsistence	.59
Supplies	1.53
Rent	.51
Communication	.05
Miscellaneous	.04
Total	13.83
Direct expense:
Training pay	124.94
Tuition	16.57
Supplies	5.72
Transportation	.07
Meals and lodging	.13
Medical	.05
Wage	.09
Grand total	160.00

Now, I submit that such statistics mean nothing at all. The Nation's gratitude has been earned by the individual, not the group. As in everything else in American life, this question of rehabilitating the maimed soldiers of America comes down to the individual. The plan of lumping all expenditures and averaging training which costs $100 with that which costs $1,000 is unfair to the trainee and to Congress, which appropriates the money.

At present you can not determine the amount of money spent to rehabilitate any trainee. A contract is made with an educational institution for a certain course to be taken by a number of disabled service men at so much per man. The certification comes in from the institution and the check is sent out.

There the record ends, with nothing to show that John Smith was one of the men who received the benefit of such tuition.

Mr. Chairman, the Vocational Board has just closed a 3-year lease on Pocono Pines, a health and pleasure resort in Monroe County, Pa.; $87,000 a year is to be paid, and the equipment used for the hospitalization and training of disabled service men.

Surely it is fundamental business sense to keep individual records of all the expenditures at such governmental institutions, distributing it properly so as to enable Congress to determine whether efficient results are being obtained from the expenditure. It has been well said that we need business in government, and there is nothing better than the motto "Do it now."

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. In entire good faith I want to ask if the gentleman has any idea as to what the cost will be in dividing the accounting up as fine as that would be, and keeping a card of cost for every beneficiary?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am sure the cost would not be prohibitive. The clerks are there, the money is being spent. Surely it would be possible to distribute the cost on an individual basis. In a business college in my district there are 50 different boys taking courses. There is nothing to show the individuals taking that course and its cost. It ought to be a simple matter to distribute it among the trainees, showing one-fiftieth was received by each individual. I am sure the benefit of this provision would be far greater than the cost. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the Nation owes a debt of honor to every disabled soldier capable of rehabilitation to so train and reeducate him that he may resume a self-supporting station in society.

That debt of honor must be paid. There have been blunders, red tape, and inefficiency in the past. These must be remedied and prevented for the future.

This measure, consolidating the work of compensation, hospitalization, and vocational training under one veterans' bureau is necessary. It is the first step in banishing the maze of red tape and ignorance and neglect which has marred the record of America.

Then the new veterans' bureau must understand that the Nation will not tolerate incompetency and neglect in dealing with the needs of those who paid in health and strength for the cause of America in the World War. The men who cashed in the vigor of their manhood on the fighting front are not objects of charity; they have earned everything that a grateful land may do for them. Not one of them must be left neglected—a penniless, jobless cripple. If one such be found in all America after this measure has gone into operation, his condition will be a black scar across the face of the Republic. Congress has provided the money and set up the machinery. Let the veterans' bureau efficiently and thoroughly do its sacred part in redeeming the Nation's promises to its disabled veterans. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. All sums heretofore and hereafter appropriated for carrying out the provisions of the war risk insurance act and amendments thereto, and to carry out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, and amendments thereto, shall, where unexpended, be made available for the veterans' bureau, and may be expended in such manner as the director deems necessary in carrying out the purposes of this act, with the restrictions heretofore imposed as to number of personnel that may be employed at stated salaries.

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BRENNAN: Page 6, at the end of line 17, strike out the period and insert a comma and the following language: "and with the further restriction that no part of said sums heretofore appropriated for medical or hospital services shall be used for the payment of commutation of quarters, subsistence, and laundry or quarters, heat, and light, and longevity to any employees other than the commissioned medical officers provided for by statute, except at such United States Public Health Service hospitals at which, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be impracticable or uneconomical or not conducive to the proper treatment of patients for whose welfare and care the director is herein made responsible to furnish quarters and subsistence in kind."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman is not germane to the section nor, I think, germane to the bill. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Chairman, one of the chief purposes of this bill is to improve the present inadequate hospital facilities for the war veterans. If this amendment or some provision similar to it is not adopted it is a rather startling fact that, despite the avowed purposes of this legislation, the hospital facilities of the Public Health Service will become on July 1 of this year less adequate and serviceable than they are to-day. On that date it will become illegal to pay nurses, reconstruction aids, and other employees of the Public Health Service commutation of quarters and subsistence. As a result, in some of the hospitals, in order to accommodate the aids and other employees under a Government roof, it will become necessary actually to reduce the number of beds now being occupied by wounded and disabled veterans and convert them for the use of the hospital employees. When the service men and their organizations are begging for additional beds and when we are appropriating millions for the construction of new hospitals, it is unthinkable that we should permit a subtraction from existing facilities.

In the last sundry civil appropriation act a provision, which becomes operative July 1, was inserted in the Senate which absolutely prohibits the payment of commutation to nurses or aids in the Public Health Service hospitals under any circumstances.

It was claimed that there had been some abuses, but instead of restricting the right to pay commutation only to appropriate cases, the Senate provision entirely denies that right. The Public Health Service will be confronted with the preplexing situation of not having suitable quarters within which to house its employees and, at the same time, will be deprived of authority to pay them for quarters in which to live outside. I am informed that it is impossible in almost every city for the Health Service to rent quarters for any reasonable amount. Where quarters are available at all, it would cost two or three times as much to maintain them as is now expended for commutation. The quarters offered, in almost every instance, are unsuitable.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRENNAN. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I received some communications upon this subject which indicated an unwillingness on the part of these nurses and reconstruction aids to live in the quarters provided for them by the Government. They seem to think that the Government ought to furnish them quarters among other nurses, and if they did not like that, then that the Government should furnish them with a private home somewhere.

Mr. BRENNAN. The purpose of this amendment is to permit the reconstruction aids and other employees to live outside only where the Government is unable to furnish them with adequate and decent quarters. At the present time the greater number of nurses are living in Government buildings.

A smaller number, whom the service is unable to accommodate, are living outside. Those nurses now living inside will not be forced outside by the provisions of this amendment, but the amendment merely seeks to take care of those for whom there is not room on the inside. It is so modified and limited as to permit the payment of commutation only at such United States Public Health Service hospitals at which, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be impracticable or uneconomical or not conducive to the proper treatment of patients to furnish quarters and subsistence in kind.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So that the gentleman does not believe that where the Government has quarters the nurses and aids should be permitted to live elsewhere and get commutation.

Mr. BRENNAN. No; my amendment merely takes care of hospitals where there are no available quarters. It aims to prevent a grave crisis in those hospitals. A reconstruction aid from Detroit called my attention to the situation which exists in the marine hospital there. They are unable to rent proper quarters anywhere near the hospital. They have been offered one dilapidated house with 11 rooms and one bath. They are actually considering using it to quarter nine women aids, an assistant administrative officer, his wife, and seven children. The probable result is that these aids, who are rendering invaluable service to the disabled veterans, will be forced out of the service.

Mr. KINDRED rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BRENNAN. Yes.
Mr. KINDRED. Because of the facts that the gentleman has so admirably stated, is it not true that the Public Health Service is, even under present conditions, seriously handicapped in securing the necessary nurses and employees needed for the work, and if the relief is not granted, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, will this handicap not seriously increase?
Mr. BRENNAN. I am informed by responsible officials of the Public Health Service that this provision, unless modified, is one of the most serious blows that has been struck at the Public Health Service since its creation. I was surprised, when this matter was brought to my attention by an individual nurse, to go down to Building C and find that the Public Health officials have made a complete survey upon the subject; that they had compiled data which showed that in the case of most of the 72 hospitals throughout the country they are unable to provide sufficient quarters, and that it was going to cost the Government several times in excess of the amount now being paid to take care of the nurses, and that then they would be taken care of in a way to greatly decrease their efficiency. I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw the point of order.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The point of order is that the amendment is not germane to the section. This section turns over the appropriation made for carrying out the Bureau of War Risk Insurance act and carrying out the act to provide for vocational rehabilitation. If we had not had the provision in lines 16 and 17, I think they would have been carried in the legislation, anyway. Line 16 merely provides that the restrictions heretofore imposed as to the number of the personnel that may be employed at stated salaries shall remain in force. In other words, we turn over the appropriations to this new bureau with the restrictions already provided by law. We make no new restrictions whatever. This proposed amendment adds a restriction to the original bill, whereas the legislation in section 6 adds no restriction whatever. The original section merely provides that the restrictions already there shall remain. We express our desire to leave the restrictions as they are. The amendment proposed by the gentleman adds a new restriction not only not in connection with the personnel but it deals with three or four other matters. It is the same proposition exactly as if we had brought in legislation without any restriction whatever and then the gentleman had endeavored to tack on a restriction.
Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Chairman, the argument made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], I believe, is answered best by referring him to the last sundry civil bill. On page 8 of the bill, which I shall present to the Chairman in a moment, under the heading of the "Bureau of War Risk Insurance," provision is made for an appropriation of $33,000,000 for the beneficiaries of the war-risk insurance for use in connection with hospital and medical services. Section 8 of the bill before us begins by referring to "all sums heretofore and hereafter appropriated for carrying out the provisions of the war risk insurance act." The most recent appropriation for fulfilling the purposes of the war risk insurance act is contained on page 8 of the sundry civil bill, and the restriction, which the gentleman mistakenly says I seek to add to this bill, is found on that same page 8 and applies to the expenditure of the money therein appropriated. On page 8 of the sundry civil bill we find the following language:

For medical, surgical, and hospital services, medical examinations, funeral expenses, etc., for beneficiaries of the war-risk insurance, including costs and other expenses incident to proceedings heretofore or hereafter taken for commitment of mentally incompetent persons to hospitals for the care and treatment of insane, $33,000,000: Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used for the payment of commutation of quarters, subsistence, etc.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my amendment reenacts the restriction contained in this proviso, and I have merely added to the restriction a qualification which would prevent its application in such particular cases as the Secretary of the Treasury deems it should not apply. In other words, I am not adding a restriction which does not exist in the present law, but I am simply repeating that restriction and then modifying it.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BRENNAN. I will.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman's amendment is an exact copy of the restriction that is already in the other appropriation?
Mr. BRENNAN. It copies it and then modifies it.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does it take away some restriction?
Mr. BRENNAN. The provision inserted in the sundry civil bill absolutely prohibits the payment of commutation under any circumstances. This amendment starts out by prohibiting it and then says that, in such cases as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem advisable, the restriction shall be removed. In other words, it modifies the absolute prohibition.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Then the effect of the gentleman's amendment is to release some restriction that is already in an appropriation?
Mr. BRENNAN. That is all. I am not trying to wipe out the entire restriction, but merely aim to modify it in certain cases where otherwise a serious emergency would arise threatening the proper conduct of the hospitals, the accommodation of the nurses, and the treatment and care of the patients.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana and the gentlemen of the committee that the provision of section 6, transferring this appropriation, carries with the appropriation the restrictions carried in the original appropriation act?
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; I think it does.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.
Mr. STAFFORD. Except the personnel.
Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit, in reference to the restriction heretofore imposed upon the number of personnel that may be employed at stated salaries, I think we might assume that is the only restriction that is carried in the proviso that this applied to, otherwise it would not be necessary to mention any restriction at all.
The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky is correct, the purpose of the gentleman from Michigan is accomplished anyway, because this provision of section 8 has the effect of repealing the provision which he seeks to amend, but if it is a repeal it is carried through that provision of section 8, and the Chair thinks any germane amendment may be offered to it.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think I inadvertently stated the effect of the amendment. It does quote in substance a restriction that was contained in the appropriation bill, but it seems in addition to carrying the restriction it removes the restriction in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury. In other words, the restriction carried in the appropriation bill was an absolute limitation, and the gentleman's proposed amendment would make it a qualified restriction, so that part what I said in reference to the point of order would not be in point. Of course, the question now before the Chair is this: We bring in a bill that provides that a certain absolute restriction shall follow this fund. Now, if this is exclusive and impliedly legislates the other restriction off the appropriation bill, then the gentleman's amendment would probably be in order. On the other hand, if it is not exclusive and is merely surplusage in effect and all the restrictions are carried, I think it would not be in order. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the restrictions are carried notwithstanding the specific provision that they should have certain restrictions, and I think lines 16 and 17 are merely legislative surplusage.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks that the effect of section 8, now under consideration, is to transfer the appropriations made under the various appropriation acts for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Bureau of Vocational Training to the new agency created by this act subject to the restrictions which were carried in the original act; and that the effect of section 8, for the purpose of consideration here, is to bring these appropriations with the restrictions upon them into the forum of the House, subject to amendment by any germane provision. The Chair therefore thinks the amendment the gentleman from Michigan has offered is an amendment which is germane to the restriction which section 8 brings into the forum of the House, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRENNAN].
The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.
Mr. RAYBURN. Division, Mr. Chairman.
The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 45.
So the amendment was rejected.
Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] a question. This section specifically transfers the appropriations that have hitherto been made in favor of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and also in favor of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. Is the omission of a transfer of appropriation made for the Public Health Service an intentional omission?

Mr. SWEET. It is, because all matters of hospitalization, in the first instance, under the war risk insurance act, went to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. And whenever the Public Health Service rendered any service for the bureau the money was allotted to the Public Health Service.

Mr. ROGERS. Has there been no specific appropriation made by Congress for the benefit of the Public Health Service that will ultimately be utilized for the veterans' bureau?

Mr. SWEET. Not for hospitalization or anything of that kind.

Mr. ROGERS. Take, for example, a question involving the examination of applicants for compensation, or a question involving the admission to hospitals. Have there not been appropriations in the past to the Public Health Service for those purposes?

Mr. SWEET. The appropriations to which the Public Health Service is entitled by reason of the war-risk insurance were made, in the first instance, to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. In other words, we appropriated at one time $48,000,000 and at another time $36,000,000, and when there was anything in connection with hospitals for any service being rendered by the Public Health Service that money was allotted to the Public Health Service.

Mr. ROGERS. Was not that a rather recent change in system? Within the last year I am familiar with the method of appropriating, but I thought until, say, 12 months ago, the practice was to appropriate directly for the Public Health Service.

Mr. SWEET. It is for certain matters pertaining to the Public Health Service. That is true. But whenever it pertained to matters in which the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was interested, it was made to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and that was allotted to the Public Health for the service rendered the bureau.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman is perfectly satisfied that no further language is needed, I am certainly satisfied; but I am afraid there may have been passed appropriations that would be tied up by the method of transfer described in this section.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Even if money had been appropriated to the Public Health Service, would that now be carried under section 8, inasmuch as that section provides that sums heretofore or hereafter appropriated for carrying out the provisions of the war insurance act——

Mr. ROGERS. The functions of the Public Health Service are exercised under a separate act of Congress.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But any money that was appropriated to the Public Health Service for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the war risk insurance act under this section 8 would be transferred to the veterans' bureau.

Mr. ROGERS. That would be true, if, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] suggests, it was appropriated to the War Risk Insurance Bureau and was allotted. I am not sure it would be so under all circumstances.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman rises in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, when section 6 was under consideration I tried to get recognition; but the Chairman evidently did not see me or else did not find it consistent to recognize me for the purpose of bringing to your attention a letter dated June 8, 1921, written by Mr. J. Byron Nickerson, department commander of the American Legion, of Wheeling, for the State of West Virginia, and I now ask the Clerk to read the letter within my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WHEELING, W. VA., June 8, 1921.

Hon. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The Sweet bill, H. R. 3, will bring relief to the long-suffering disabled veterans only if principle involved in section 6 as originally drawn is carried out. If passed with section 6 as amended by committees, 2-year fight for the disabled ex-service men will have been in vain. On behalf of the American Legion of West Virginia I urge you to support the Sweet bill with section 6 as originally drawn.

With sincere good wishes, I am,
Faithfully, yours,

J. BYRON NICKERSON,
Department Commander.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The original House bill No. 3 contained the section No. 6 as the legion desired it to be passed or enacted into law. It provided for 14 regional reserve officers and such subofficers as the director might deem necessary. Now, I have some doubt as to the wisdom of that provision, but I believe in the consolidation of the different agencies of the Government that undertake to deal with soldiers' affairs, and I believe that the disintegration of the units that are now doing the proper work—and I particularly refer to the War Risk Insurance Bureau—and the dividing up of that work with 14 different departments is going to give us two years more of delay. The departments having in charge this work have just now begun to work smoothly. The wheels of the machinery are revolving, and they seem to be lubricated. By the measure before us it is proposed to create new machinery, and it is going to take two years or more to organize the department and to bring it into proper relation one part with the other. If you are not going to please the soldier, if you are not going to grant what he wants done, then you had best not pass any bill at all. What I desire to say is this: That when the time comes we should either adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] or else the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND], for either one of those amendments would be in harmony with the views of the members of the American Legion. In other words, they have asked for bread and this bill in its present form gives them a stone.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, with the establishment of 14 independent regional boards it necessarily follows that there will be 14 different standards of compensation?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. You are right. And as it is now the soldiers have 435 agents, all Members of the House of Representatives, who, with their secretaries, find it a pleasure to look after their interests, but if regional departments are formed, scattered all over the country, then they will be beyond our reach and jurisdiction.

I believe the main object of the bill—the consolidation of all soldiers' Government activities into one bureau, called in the bill the veterans' bureau, to be desirable and that the principle of the bill is therefore sound.

But is is true, nevertheless, that 14 agents scattered over the country without a large number of subagents would only delay action on soldiers' claims. Speed is the essence of the proposition the soldiers are advancing. They have given the subject much thought. They believe that section 6 as originally written will bring them relief, and so I propose to stand by them to the end.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto terminate in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] consent that I offer an amendment and have one minute in which to discuss it?

Mr. WINSLOW. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WALSH). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate terminates in 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of any legislation that will tend to assist in taking care of those soldiers of the war who are disabled, I am hoping to see legislation put into this bill which will enforce the legislation already on the books to take care of them.

There is very material legislation that is now being absolutely ignored, and legislation which the parties charged with the administration of certain departments say they propose to ignore, in so far as the soldier is concerned. The act of July 11, 1919, provides—that hereafter in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive branch of the Government, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines who themselves are not qualified, but whose wives are qualified to hold such positions.

The Civil Service Commission has laid down the rule that when a soldier stands an examination, if he makes 65 he is put at the head of the list for certification.

Now, the recent order of the President as to the appointment of postmasters provides that they will take one out of the three highest. Now, I am concerned about that, because two postmasters in my district to-day are merely temporary postmasters, acting postmasters. They were soldiers. They won their appointments in the examination before the Civil Service Commission. They were appointed, but failed of confirmation, and when I go to the Post Office Department I am informed that they have got to stand another examination; and, if they get on the list of the three highest, the Post Office Department declines to say that it will appoint a soldier, but says, "We propose to select the postmaster out of the three highest, regardless of whether he is a soldier or not."

Here is a proposition from which you can not escape. You have a law. It is an executive appointment, and when the certification is made of the three highest, if one of them is a soldier, if you propose to leave it to that law, then you have got to appoint him, regardless of whether you want him or not, and if you do not propose to enforce this law, then what law do you propose to live by?

I hope to see something put into this bill, and will offer an amendment presently that will require them to appoint a soldier wherever he is eligible, where the soldier is certified, and you shall not be allowed to play politics by going down and taking some ward politician or Republican neighborhood rooter and appointing him and leaving the soldier off. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I wish to offer, on page 6, line 17, to strike out "personnel" and insert "persons."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Page 6, line 17, strike out the word "personnel" and insert in lieu thereof the word "persons."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, "personnel," as I understand it, includes the whole body of the persons. Then literally this would be the whole number of persons employed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 3.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. The director, subject to the general directions of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be responsible for the proper examination, medical care, treatment, hospitalization, dispensary, and convalescent care, necessary and reasonable after care, welfare of, nursing, vocational training, and such other services as may be necessary in the carrying out of the provisions of this act, and for that purpose is hereby authorized to utilize the now existing or future facilities of the United States Public Health Service, the War Department, the Navy Department, the Interior Department, the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and such other governmental facilities as may be made available for the purposes set forth in this act; and such governmental agencies are hereby authorized and directed to furnish such facilities, including personnel, equipment, medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies as the director may deem necessary and advisable in carrying out the provisions of this act, in addition to such governmental facilities as are hereby made available.

In order to standardize the character of examination, medical care, treatment, hospitalization, dispensary, and convalescent care, nursing, vocational training, and such other services as may be necessary for beneficiaries under this act, the director shall maintain an inspection service, with authority to examine all facilities and services utilized in carrying out the purpose of this act, and for this purpose may utilize such other Government or private agencies as may be deemed practicable and necessary.

When, in the opinion of the director, the facilities and services utilized for the hospitalization, medical care, and treatment for beneficiaries under this act are unsatisfactory, the director shall make arrangements for the further hospitalization, care, and treatment of these beneficiaries by other means.

In the event that there is not sufficient Government hospital and other facilities for the proper medical care and treatment of beneficiaries under this act, and it is deemed necessary and advisable to secure additional Government facilities, the director shall make such recommendation to the Secretary of the Treasury as in his opinion is deemed necessary and advisable for the further improvement or extension of existing governmental facilities, or for the acquiring, including construction, of additional facilities; such new property and structures as may be recommended shall become part of the permanent equipment of some one of the now existing agencies of the Government, including the War Department, Navy Department, Interior Department, Treasury Department, the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in such a way as would best serve the present emergency, taking into consideration the future services to be rendered the veterans of the World War, including the beneficiaries under this act.

In the event Government hospital facilities and other facilities are not thus available or are not sufficient, the director may contract with State, municipal, or private hospitals for such medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies as may be required, and such contracts may be made for a period of not exceeding 10 years and may be for the use of a ward or other hospital unit or on such other basis as may be in the best interest of the beneficiaries under this act.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL: Page 7, line 11, insert the following: "Provided, That in the treatment of disabled, sick, or otherwise incapacitated ex-service men and men now in the service, no existing laws or regulations shall be construed to take from the physicians of the United States Public Health Service the officers of the Army Medical Corps, the medical officers of the Navy, and other physicians operating under this act the right to prescribe in such amounts and at such times as they deem in their discretion necessary, and purely for medicinal purposes, beer, wines, and spirituous liquors."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order against the amendment. Does the gentleman from Maryland desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HILL. The gentleman does.

Mr. Chairman, this is a very essential perfecting amendment to this bill, and I feel sure that, when fully understood, this committee will vote unanimously for it, because I am sure that no member of this committee will desire to have it said that he was against an Army doctor prescribing any medicine for a sick soldier that the Army doctor saw fit to prescribe.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman from Maryland is not confining himself to the point of order. He is discussing the merits of the amendment.

Mr. HILL. I am coming to that. But the merits are so obvious that they need no further discussion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is too serious a subject upon which to make such a ridiculous amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HILL. The only ridiculous proposition is that of the gentleman who just spoke. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, this is not a frivolous proposition, but a serious one. Section 9 of this bill provides—

The director, subject to the general directions of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be responsible for the proper examination, medical care, treatment, hospitalization, dispensary, and convalescent care, necessary and reasonable after care, welfare of, nursing, vocational training, and such other services as may be necessary in the carrying out of the provisions of this act.

In other words, under the first part of this section 9 it lies entirely within the province of the director of the veterans' bureau to make such dietetic rules as he desires to make, any rules that he deems necessary; and this amendment is simply offered here in the interest of preventing that onspreading wave of fanaticism that seems to have swept over this country.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order is not being discussed by the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would admonish the gentleman from Maryland on this occasion to discuss the point of order.

Mr. HILL. My contention, Mr. Chairman, is that this amendment is intended to prevent the director of the veterans' bureau from interfering with the proper treatment of a soldier under the orders of the doctors of the Medical Corps.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The amendment offered by the gentleman provides—

That no existing laws or regulations shall be construed to take from the physicians of the United States Public Health Service, the officers of the Army Medical Corps, the medical officers of the Army, and other physicians operating under this act, the right to prescribe in such amounts and at such times as they deem in their discretion necessary, and purely for medicinal purposes, beer, wines, and spiritous liquors.

Of course, that deals with all laws and is not limited to this law. If it was a limitation upon the effect of this law, it might be in order, but it is clearly not in order when it undertakes to limit the effect of all existing laws relating to intoxicating liquors.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Maryland is in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as contained in the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will yield, this is not for beverage purposes but for medicinal purposes. The eighteenth amendment does not touch medicinal purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going to turn around, as the gentleman from Maryland did, and address our colleague or the country up in the gallery. I am going to address only the Chair on a point of order. The eighteenth amendment controls the action of a physician with respect to his right to prescribe intoxicating liquors. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland would let a physician go beyond the Volstead Act, passed to enforce the Constitution, and would permit him to use his individual discretion as to when, how much, and to whom he could prescribe. I submit that the amendment is clearly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] makes a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL]. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is in the form of a proviso, the substance of which is that physicians of the Public Health Service, officers of the Army Medical Corps, and the medical officers of the Government and other physicians operating under the act shall have the right to prescribe, at such times as they deem necessary, and purely for medicinal purposes, beer, wine, and spirituous liquors. That amendment is offered at line 11, page 7, to section 9 of the bill.

In the judgment of the Chair the amendment in the form of a proviso is not germane to the provisions of the section to which it is offered, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to read the provisions on page 7, commencing with line 21, down to and including the end of line 2, on page 8, and to ask the chairman of the committee just what that means and what is the purpose of it. It reads as follows:

When, in the opinion of the director, the facilities and services utilized for the hospitalization, medical care, and treatment for beneficiaries under this act are unsatisfactory, the director shall make arrangements for the further hospitalization, care, and treatment of these beneficiaries by other means.

What does the committee intend by that language?

Mr. SWEET. Under the provisions of section 9 the veterans' bureau has full charge of the assignment of the beneficiaries of the veterans' bureau to the Public Health Service hospitals or to private hospitals, as the case may be, for the purpose of giving them hospitalization. Now, after having assigned a patient to a hospital and the patient is not receiving treatment and care to which he is entitled, then in that event the new bureau can send that patient to any other hospital, or provide other hospital facilities for him.

Mr. RAKER. Right in that connection, I did not realize that that was what the committee meant. It brings up the question I wanted to propound to the committee. Does the patient have the determination of the question whether he is receiving sufficient care and treatment, or do the director and the doctors in attendance determine that?

Mr. SWEET. Of course, the care that the patient receives is determined by the director of the veterans' bureau.

Mr. RAKER. I have been advised—I will not vouch for it—that men have had as many as 15 changes of hospital; that a man has gone to a hospital, stayed there a few days, has done as he pleased, violated all the rules, left of his own volition, and gone to one hospital after another, as many as fifteen times.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman from California that I have heard like statements.

Mr. RAKER. I think this is important, and the committee ought to know about it. Is there any provision in this bill whereby the Government, or the hospital authorities, or the director of the veterans' bureau have any real authority to administer the law and to protect the public and to protect a young man who is desirous of moving from place to place at his own volition?

Mr. SWEET. I call the gentleman's attention to section 11, which will be reached in a few moments, which reads:

The director is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary in order to promote good conduct on the part of persons who are receiving care or treatment in hospitals, homes, or institutions as patients or beneficiaries of said bureau during their stay in such hospitals, homes, institutions, or training centers.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman believe that provision will cure the present unsatisfactory conditions?

Mr. SWEET. It will have a tendency to cure such unsatisfactory condition.

Mr. RAKER. I think every ex-service man is interested in this. We ought not to allow the service to be broken down by a few or a number of men who desire to use their own volition to go wherever they want to as against the hospital rules and regulations.

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. RAKER. Is there any means of curbing that?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; section 11 provides for discipline in hospitals.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman believe that the provisions of section 11 are sufficient to cure the present unsatisfactory conditions?

Mr. SWEET. In the opinion of the committee that will be done.

Mr. RAKER. On the statement of the gentleman I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 12 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the work of this committee ordinarily is very satisfactory. I think that this product of their genius is very disappointing to the Members of the House.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman refers to section 6?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; I especially refer to section 6. Anyone who gives section 6 even a casual reading will say that it is not properly framed, not properly drawn, is loosely and carelessly drawn, and drawn, in my judgment, without a proper knowledge of the facts. I am convinced, and so are men who have studied and are familiar with the situation, that the majority of the members of this committee when they framed section 6 had no sufficient knowledge of what was actually being done for the ex-service men under the existing organization. I have talked with members of the committee that did not know that the Public Health Department had men stationed at all the substations over the country to examine these boys. I talked with members of the committee that did not know how many substations they had in the country, and yet they framed this bill, saying you should not have over 50. They did not know what was being done under existing law.

When the clouds broke in the New York newspapers, raising old Cain and demanding an investigation of the Vocational Board, we made an investigation into the terrible conditions that prevailed among the soldiers all over the country who could not get any help. The decision was that the bureau needed decentralization; that it was necessary to bring the helpful activities closer to the boys, and so they went out and established 148 stations where they could bring the boy in, or where the boy could go himself and get in touch with those who were authorized to help him. The substation was never given authority to pass on his case finally. But after a little while we found that the boys could get relief in this way, and they ceased their criticism of Congress. Now, here you want to go back to where you were, as far as going out and reaching the boys are concerned. You are saying that we will centralize again, so that the boys will be wandering over the country asking where they can get relief or get a job which the Government has trained them for.

This is a different proposition than the pension substations system to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] spoke about the other day. That referred only to pensions and the distribution of pensions. This is a proposition of giving men rehabilitation training and hospitalization and other relief. It is a question of restoring them to health and giving them help which Civil War veterans never received. We did not have these things after the Civil War; we did not give veterans of the Civil War that kind of treatment. I can not understand how you can talk about wanting to help the veterans and yet cut the existing necessary machinery down, and thus destroy a helpful organization for the soldiers' relief. Some say that we want these little places in the States for plunder purposes. Why, God bless you, these are little, small jobs, with small salaries. No high salaries are paid. It is a place where the boy can go and get help to make out his papers, and get all necessary information and assistance. We have 3 of these offices in Indiana, 9 in Texas, 6 in Ohio, 5 in Michigan, 4 in Minnesota, 4 in Oklahoma, 5 in Illinois, and a similar number in other States. I tell you, gentlemen, that the clouds will break again, because the boys can not find the places to get relief if you abandon these suboffices. The records of almost 100 suboffices now operating will be dumped into regional offices upon the passage of this bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. May I ask when the gentleman first discovered the ignorance of the committee?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. This is a glaring example of it.

Mr. WINSLOW. I asked the gentleman the time when he began to discover the ignorance of the committee.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I have been noticing it for quite a while.

Mr. WINSLOW. With the superior information in the gentleman's mind, did he ever appear before the subcommittee or the committee at any time to give the committee the benefit of his information?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that I am not in close enough relation with the committee to know when it meets, I have never been invited before the committee, but I have talked with the chairman of the subcommittee and the author of this bill, and I do not believe he is in favor of section 6 as it stands. I do not mean that the gentleman told me that, but I do not believe the man is for it, because I think he thinks too much of the soldiers to be for it.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me to ask a question of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Is it not a fact that the late Col. Galbraith, chairman of the American Legion, national commander, appeared before the committee and made certain recommendations which were not adopted?

Mr. WINSLOW. That is very true; yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. And he told me that he was against the "50" provision in section 6, and you know it, and you know that the people who are enforcing this law, the members of the Vocational Board and the director and the Public Health Department, and everyone who has anything to do now in an official way with taking care of these soldiers, is against the 50 provision of section 6.

Mr. WINSLOW. No. I do not know any such thing.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Well, you ought to know it.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of supplementing the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order. Unless the gentleman intends to confine his remarks to the section under discussion, I shall object.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and, if I may, I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. In answer to questions the other day, on an earlier section, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] explained that the actual management of the hospitals under this bill would be in all respects, as at present, in the hands of the Public Health Service.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; after the patient has been put there.

Mr. ROGERS. After the patient has been examined and assigned to the hospital?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. With that thought in mind, I wondered how fair and how practicable it was to provide in this section that the director of the veterans' bureau shall be responsible, among other things, for the medical care, treatment, hospitalization, welfare, and nursing, and so on, of these patients. In other words, it would seem to me that the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, who has sole responsibility and authority under the previous section, would find it rather awkward if he were told that the director of the veterans' bureau also had the responsibility.

Mr. SWEET. And the gentleman would get into the same difficulty that we are in now. The patient is under the care and treatment, in the first instance, of the veterans' bureau, and the responsibility of furnishing that care is upon the bureau. When the patient goes to the Public Health Service I may say that that in a sense is in the nature of a contract.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman from Iowa think it is fair, when the Director of the War Risk Bureau assigns a War Risk patient to a hospital under the direct charge and control of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, that the director should be held responsible by law for the medical care and treatment, hospitalization, welfare, nursing of that patient?

Mr. SWEET. Why, certainly; because we must locate the responsibility, and then it must be remembered that in this veterans' bureau there will be a medical division. Of course, we do not furnish the hospitalization immediately to the patient in the veterans' bureau, but the responsibility for looking after him and seeing that he gets it is upon the new bureau.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it the thought of the gentleman that the Surgeon General and the director of the veterans' bureau are both responsible?

Mr. SWEET. In a way they are, but as far as the service to be rendered and the responsibility for it is concerned, that is upon the director of the new bureau.

Mr. ROGERS. Can the director of the bureau issue a binding order to the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service in these matters?

Mr. SWEET. I think he can.

Mr. ROGERS. I think that he ought to be able to do so; but I fear as the bill is drawn that you will have two men of coordinate responsibility, with neither able to enforce his mandate on the other.

Mr. SWEET. I think the language is very plain in section 9 that the responsibility for hospitalization and care and treatment and for furnishing these facilities is upon the director of the bureau.

Mr. ROGERS. And the gentleman thinks that would carry with it the thought that the director could issue binding instructions to the Public Health Surgeon General?

Mr. SWEET. There is not any question about that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I raised the same question at one time in the consideration of this matter in the committee. I think the language at the bottom of page 6 clearly gives that right. It makes the director responsible for all of it and it says that for that purpose he is authorized to utilize it.

Mr. ROGERS. The power to "utilize the facilities" is not quite the same as the power to issue instructions to the Surgeon General.

Mr. BRIGGS. On page 7 of the same section we find this language about the middle of the page:

> And such governmental agencies are hereby authorized and directed to furnish such facilities, including personnel, equipment, medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies as the director may deem necessary and advisable in carrying out the provisions of this act, in addition to such governmental facilities as are hereby made available.

Mr. ROGERS. I am frank to say that if the understanding of the gentleman from Iowa is carried into effect I am perfectly satisfied; but I do not want the poor fellow who is sent to the hospital to fall between the two stools of divided authority.

Mr. BRIGGS. I think there is a provision here which expressly confers upon the director that absolute power which it is expected he should exercise to give the soldiers the treatment that they ought to have, and also places responsibility upon him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, on page 7, line 3, and on page 8, line 16, to strike out "s" in the word "homes." The official designation of this institution is the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. SWEET. But there is more than one branch, and this was put in for the purpose——

Mr. ROGERS. I understand that, but Congress has given it the designation of "Home," with various branches.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 10. For the purpose of this act, the director is authorized to detail from time to time clerks or persons employed in the bureau, to make examinations into the merits of compensation and insurance claims, whether pending or adjudicated, as he may deem proper, and to aid in the preparation, presentation, or examination of such claims; and any such person so detailed shall have power to administer oaths, take affidavits, and certify to the correctness of the papers and documents pertaining to the administration of this act.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I ask to have reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 9, line 13, after the word "act," strike out period and insert colon and add the following: "Provided, That in appointing clerks to be detailed for such service, or for any other service under this bill, former soldiers who are eligible shall be preferred, in accordance with the act of July 11, 1919."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, following what I said just a moment ago, pursuant to the act of 1919 the Civil Service Commission put in force this rule:

> All competitors rated at 70 or more shall be eligible for appointment and their names shall be placed on the proper register according to their ratings, but the names of persons preferred under the urgent deficiency act of July 11, 1919, rated at 65 or more, shall be placed above all others.

Now, that is the rule adopted to carry out the law of 1919. Until the recent order, the order of May 10, which changed the rule as to the selection of postmasters, an ex-soldier who got 65 or more was put at the top, and under the rule they had to take him, and under the preference law they had to take him. Under that presidential order of May 10 they can put him at the top. All right, but the selecting power can take the fellow who is at the bottom and leave him perched at the top, and when I called on the First Assistant Postmaster General about this and asked him if it was proposed to give the soldier a preference whenever he was on the certified list, he said he did not propose to do that; that they proposed to make their own selection, and if it appealed to him they would appoint the eligible soldier, and if it did not they would not. I called attention to this. He said that they did get their preference by reason of the fact that they are at the top of the list. Well, but I say if you put them at the top of the list and you reserve the right to take the fellow at the bottom, where does the preference come in? How can you repeal a law that way? It is pure camouflage, that is all. Now, the other answer is this: The department shifted its ground to this position, and that is this, that the first, second, and third class postmasters are not under the classified civil service but are merely under the order of the President. I accept that proposition, but the act of 1919 says all appointments in executive offices—it does not say under the classified civil service or under any other service. You can not get away from it. The order of May 10, if carried out as proposed by the Post Office Department, would close the door in the face of the ex-soldier who has been given preference by act of Congress, and this Congress when it is legislating for the benefit of the ex-soldier owes it to the ex-soldier to see that we do not propose to be hypocritical about it, and we either should make them carry out the law or repeal the law, one or the other, and this is one step, and we ought to make them live up to the law which we enacted.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that section 10 deals entirely with detailing clerks already in the service. It is a matter of where they shall be sent and what they shall do, while the gentleman's amendment deals with the appointing of clerks and hence is not germane to this section.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the general purpose of this bill, as is written all over it, is to take care of the former soldier. The proposition is embraced here to detail certain clerks to do certain things. I have offered an amendment to provide that clerks who are so detailed shall be appointed under the terms of the soldier preference act, and if it is not germane to the purpose of the bill under this section, then we will let it go and we will see about it another time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair, in the first place, can not concern himself about the merits of this amendment. The Chair does not think that because this bill is in the interest of ex-service men that any amendment which might be proposed in the interest of ex-service men would therefore be in order as an amendment to this bill. The particular section to which this amendment is offered deals solely with the detail of clerks already in the service and its provisions are limited to such details, while the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina deals with original appointments to the service. The Chair thinks that an amendment dealing with original appointments to the service is not germane to a provision which deals solely with details within the service, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments be closed in 10 minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STAFFORD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, and had agreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 76, 86, 89, 92, 95, 96, 100, 105, 106, 113, 114, and 119, had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, had insisted upon said amendment, and had requested a further conference with the House, and had ordered that Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. GLASS be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I ask the attention of the committee to something that I failed to bring to their attention, because of my misunderstanding of the motion of the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge. I refer to the closing lines of section 9:

In the event Government hospital facilities and other facilities are not thus available or are not sufficient, the director may contract with State, municipal, or private hospitals for such medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies as may be required, and such contracts may be made for a period of not exceeding 10 years—for the use of a ward or other hospital unit or on such other basis as may be in the best interests of the beneficiaries under this act.

That means that he can make 10-year contracts with private hospitals—

Private hospitals, some of them, are worthy institutions; but some of them, it is said, are not. They are by some managers treated chiefly as places of business in which to make money. And this provision granting the director power to make contracts for the "use of a ward or other hospital unit or on such other basis," and so forth, would permit him to rent parts of private hospitals or entire private hospitals and to send helpless soldiers to them to be treated. Now under whose auspices are these sick soldiers to be treated in these private hospitals? The bill says nothing about that, but leaves it to the director to make any contract he may desire to make. He would have authority, should this provision become law, to turn the treatment over to the managers of these private institutions and their assistants on such terms as may be in the respective contracts.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman believe that any contract made with a private hospital would be on the condition of extending proper care, and that the breach of that condition would vitiate the contract?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The bill does not say so. It makes no such requirement. There is no word about any condition—no attempt at precaution or safeguard. Everything in the contracts is to be left to one man. This is supposed to be a Government of laws, not of men. And when you thus turn over to a director the power to rent private hospitals for 10 years and send soldiers to them for treatment you are conferring such authority as, in my judgment, no man ought to have.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think that refers to the terms "use of a ward or other hospital unit or on such other basis."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The words "or on such other basis," following, as they do, the words "a ward or other hospital unit," would, under the ordinary rule of statutory construction, include the whole hospital. That is the ordinary rule. You are referring to dimension when you say "ward" or "other hospital unit," and also, of course, by construction, when you say "other basis." And it all means that the director, in his discretion, can make contracts for the renting of private hospitals.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think that power was intended to be conferred.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has expired. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that the hospitalization question for disabled soldiers is one of the most important questions that confronts the country to-day. The question naturally arises whether or not we will embark upon a great hospital building program or whether we will meet the immediate situation. The hospitalization question is an immediate question. For instance, in the Langley bill we appropriate $18,600,000; $12,500,000 is for construction and $6,100,000 for the remodeling of hospitals. Now, it is estimated that it will take five or six years before these hospitals can be constructed and patients can be placed in them. And why? In the first place, it is a question of determining where they shall be located, of obtaining blue prints, and so forth, and then comes the question of construction. It is estimated that in about five or six years we will reach the peak in hospitalization. The hospitalization question is a temporary one, and in the space of some 25 or 30 years it will practically be over. To be sure, it will be necessary to furnish care and treatment to the insane and to those who have tuberculosis or other diseases, but the question of hospitalization will practically be over. At the present time there are about 119,000 that have passed through hospitals. To-day there are some 25,400 in the hospitals. And it has been estimated that those desiring hospitalization are increasing at the rate of about 1,000 per month. Now then, in order to meet that situation, in order that the director may meet it squarely, and that hospitalization may be immediately given to these men, we have given him authority, in the last paragraph of section 9 of the bill, whereby he can contract with hospitals; whereby he can contract with counties or municipalities to furnish hospitalization. The Members of the House will remember the difficulty we have had with the State of New York, where the treasurer could not sign a contract for a period longer than two years. And so I say to you that, instead of embarking upon a great hospital program and constructing buildings for that purpose, the thing for us to do as sane men, it seems to me, is to meet the proposition immediately [applause], and that is the reason why we have put section 9 in this bill.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. There was a bill introduced some time ago, I believe, for the construction of a hospital by the State of New York, to be leased for this purpose at 10 per cent per annum for 10 years. Now, would it be any more expensive for the United States to build a hospital and own it than to pay for it and not own it?

Mr. SWEET. The trouble with the gentleman's position is this, that the hospitalization proposition is immediate, and instead of going on and building hospitals and taking five or six years in which to construct them, it is far better to go out and utilize buildings and facilities that now exist.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. You do not say buildings that now exist. That building was not yet erected and is not yet built, and still there was a tentative agreement that the War Risk Insurance Bureau was going to lease it at the rate of 10 per cent per annum for 10 years. In other words, this Government is going to pay for it, and at the end of 10 years somebody else is going to own it. I see nothing in this bill to prevent that sort of thing occurring. If you limit that to buildings already constructed, so that they can be utilized at once, that will be a different proposition.

Mr. SWEET. It is not necessary in the interest of the disabled soldiers to limit it. We should leave it to the sound discretion of the director.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. You have limited it in the case of the hospitals already constructed. I should think it ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I understand the limit of $18,000,000 has already been fixed, so that it is not available for construction.

Mr. SWEET. It was just recently changed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an editorial from the Baltimore American and one from the Baltimore Sun, a letter from Infantry Post, No. 71, American Legion, and from the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD editorials and letters as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Are these liquor advertisements?

Mr. HILL. No; they are not liquor advertisements.

Mr. BLANTON. Are they on the subject of liquors?

Mr. HILL. They are on the subject of the right of the doctors to prescribe.

Mr. BLANTON. If it was on any other subject I would not object, but on this subject I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And I renew the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. The director is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary in order to promote good conduct on the part of persons who are receiving care or treatment in hospitals, homes, or institutions as patients or beneficiaries of said bureau during their stay in such hospitals, homes, institutions, or training centers. Penalties for the breach of such rules and regulations may extend to a forfeiture by the offender of such portion of the compensation payable to him, not exceeding three-fourths of the monthly installment per month for three months, for a breach committed while receiving treatment in such hospital, home, institution, or training center as may be prescribed by such rules and regulations.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona moves to strike out the section.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to bring to the attention of the committee a letter and a resolution adopted by a number of ex-service men, most of whom are patients in a large Government hospital in my State, objecting principally to the provisions of section 14 of the original bill, H. R. 3, which is now section 11 of this bill. They state that the enforcement of military discipline in the Public Health Service hospitals is not necessary, because under existing conditions there is now ample authority for all discipline needed to promote good conduct. In their opinion the Public Health Service officials are seeking the authority, in the administration of this law, that an Army officer would have over soldiers under his command. I would like to have some explanation from the gentleman from Iowa, who is in charge of this legislation, as to why this particular section has been inserted in the bill.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman from Arizona that this is a matter to which we gave very careful consideration. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Laporte; Col. Galbraith, the national commander of the American Legion; and others came before us and said that there ought to be something of this kind placed in the law. In other words, at these hospitals it is necessary that there shall be discipline. A man, we will say, is receiving $80 a month as compensation. After receiving that amount of money, in some instances he would leave the hospital, go down town, perhaps get intoxicated, come back to the hospital, and do things that he would not do if he were not intoxicated. Now, then, in order that the hospital may render the most efficient service to the disabled men, it is necessary to have discipline.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is there absolutely no way of enforcing proper discipline now?

Mr. SWEET. Oftentimes when the Public Health Service officials come to enforce discipline they say to them, "You can leave the hospital."

Mr. HAYDEN. Is that all that can be done at the present time, to put the patient out of the hospital?

Mr. SWEET. This hospitalization is furnished to them, and the Government has not any control of ex-service men unless they are in the Military Establishment, but in that case it is because they are in an Army or a Navy hospital. But the man who is receiving hospitalization can leave that hospital any day if he wants to, or he can do almost anything that he has a mind to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the regulations to promote good conduct in hospitals amount to what is practically military discipline?

Mr. SWEET. No. There is no such thought; and, besides that, it is placed in the hands of the director, and the director will prescribe the rules and regulations for that discipline.

Mr. HAYDEN. Then it will not be absolutely in the power of the superintendent of each Public Health Service hospital to make his own rules and regulations?

Mr. SWEET. No. "The director is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary in order to promote good conduct" on the part of the patients.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the director might make a regulation to the effect that whatever rules the superintendent of a particular hospital might see fit to make would apply.

Mr. SWEET. These rules are to be made by the director of this great bureau.

Mr. HAYDEN. It seems to me that it would improve the bill to provide that the director may make general rules and regulations so that the same system of discipline would be in effect in all hospitals.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman does not want to restrict the director of the bureau from making specific rules if in the interest of the Government and of the soldiers those rules are necessary?

Mr. HAYDEN. I can not see the necessity for anything except a general set of regulations which would govern all hospitals.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Can not the gentleman conceive of a case of a large hospital caring for a large group of men under certain circumstances and conditions requiring rules and regulations for that place that may not be applicable to other places?

Mr. HAYDEN. No. In each case they would deal with individual breaches of good conduct.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. These would be general rules applying to that particular institution, of course. Surely there must be the power in the hands of the director to make specific rules.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Suppose a particular abuse crept into a particular institution, an abuse that did not take place in any other institution in the country. Would not that require particular treatment, and would it not impose restraint that would perhaps be unwise on 99 other institutions because it was found that in one institution it was absolutely necessary?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman is imagining a hypothetical case. In each instance some individual would do something that he ought not to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD the letter and resolutions that I have mentioned, which I have obtained from the files of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which they were originally referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter and resolutions are as follows:

BUCKY O'NEIL POST, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
AND ERNEST A. LOVE POST NO. 6, AMERICAN LEGION, Prescott, Ariz., May 12, 1921.

HON. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: At a joint meeting of the local posts of the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, held May 9, a resolution was passed unanimously protesting against certain features of H. R. No. 3, known as the Sweet bill, which is now under consideration by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. A copy of this resolution is herewith inclosed. The objectionable portions of this bill are sections 14, 16, and 19.

Section 14 provides, in effect, that the compensation of patients in hospital may be forfeited for infraction of hospital rules up to three-fourths of said compensation. We think that this legislation is entirely too drastic. There are ample ways to enforce discipline in Public Health hospitals without taking away from a disabled soldier his compensation given him for injuries received in the service of his country. Before the war there were at the Army hospital at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., a large number of pensioned ex-soldiers, known as "Beneficiaries of the Soldiers' Home." These men were not soldiers and not subject to Army regulations. They could not be tried by court-martial, neither could their pensions be forfeited or interfered with in any way. Yet no particular difficulty was experienced in controlling these men. We do not think that the control of the disabled men of the late war should offer any greater difficulty.

Section 16 provides that, in certain cases, the hospital authorities may take away from a patient three-fourths of his compensation and hold it as a sort of trust for him until he is discharged from the hospital or until he dies, when the fund would be turned into his estate. We think that this is paternalism rampant. No such control of the pensions granted on account of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War was ever attempted, and we believe that we are just as capable of using our compensation to our best advantage as the pensioners of those wars are to handle their own pensions in the way most suitable to themselves.

Section 19 would grant power to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to reduce or entirely stop the compensation previously granted in any given case, and this without giving the person interested the right or opportunity to contest such action.

The mere presentation of these sections is sufficient to show the drastic and arbitrary character of the powers proposed to be given to the bureau and the hospital authorities and why they are so objectionable to the disabled soldiers. They are certainly not in accord with the spirit of the platforms adopted by both political parties at the last election, wherein the debt of the country to the disabled soldier was acknowledged and promises were made of the most generous treatment to these men.

We therefore request your active support in obtaining the elimination or modification of the sections of the Sweet bill above referred to. And kindly see that this letter and attached resolution be made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Respectfully,

M. L. GANEY, Chairman.

RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas sections 14, 16, and 19 of bill H. R. 3, recently introduced in Congress, would empower the Public Health Service to fine disabled men a considerable part of their compensation for violations of hospital rules; and

Whereas a provision of this kind is contrary to the spirit and letter of the compensation law, which was meant to be a measure of relief for men disabled in the military service and not subject to attachments of any kind; and

Whereas the application of military discipline in Public Health hospitals would tend to create discontent and irritation among patients, which would in this way retard their recovery, and this is wholly needless to the hospital authorities, for they already have ample power to punish violators of rules; and

Whereas the indiscriminate granting of power in the hands of some men who crave military authority would create an autocratic organization of the Public Health Service: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, patients of United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 50, members of Veterans of Foreign Wars and the American Legion, in mass meeting assembled, do hereby register our emphatic protest against the sections of the bill as being an oppressive and wholly uncalled-for piece of legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to President Harding, to Senators ASHURST and CAMERON, Congressman CARL HAYDEN, to the chairman House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and to the press.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. The director may set forth in regulations to be prescribed by him the conditions and limitations whereby all patients or beneficiaries of the veterans' bureau who are receiving treatment through the bureau as inmates of a hospital may allot any proportion or proportions or any fixed amount or amounts of their monthly compensation for such purposes and for the benefit of such person or persons as they may direct.

In case such inmate has not allotted three-fourths of his monthly compensation, regulations to be made by the director may provide that any unallotted portion of such three-fourths compensation may be deposited to his credit with the Secretary of the Treasury to accumulate at such rate of interest as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, but at a rate never less than 3½ per cent per annum, payable for no period, however, of less than six months, and when payable shall be paid, principal and interest, to such patient if living; otherwise to any beneficiary or beneficiaries he may have designated, or if there be no such beneficiary, then to the executor or administrator of the estate of such deceased person: Provided, That this paragraph shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amounts due to the decedent's estate of his funeral expenses, expenses of last illness, board, rent, lodging, or other household expenses for which decedent is liable, provided a claim therefor is presented by the creditors or by the person or persons who actually paid the same before settlement by the veterans' bureau.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to invest and reinvest the said allotments deposited with him, or any part thereof, in interest-bearing obligations of the United States and to sell the obligations for the purposes of said funds.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question in regard to the first part of section 12, wherein it is provided that—

The director may set forth in regulations to be prescribed by him the conditions and limitations whereby all patients or beneficiaries of the veterans' bureau who are receiving treatment through the bureau as inmates of a hospital may allot any proportion or proportions or any fixed amount or amounts of their monthly compensation for such purposes and for the benefit of such person or persons as they may direct.

To whom does this have reference? Is that to the members of his family or dependents, and is it intended that the director may withhold a portion of the monthly compensation and award it to them?

Mr. SWEET. In the first place, the director does not allot anything. That is a matter that is purely voluntary. A patient in a hospital who is a beneficiary of the veterans' bureau can make an allotment to any person. In other words, the compensation that he receives is his own, and he allots it as he sees fit.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. What is the object in having this provision in here at all?

Mr. SWEET. The object is simply this, that when a man goes into a hospital those in charge of the hospital can sit down and talk matters over with him, and he can make an allotment to his wife or his children or to whomsoever may be dependent upon him, and instead of spending the money for things that are unimportant and unnecessary, as many of them do now, and neglect their families, after a man has made this voluntary allotment then the money can be paid to the dependent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is not limited to dependents.

Mr. SWEET. No; he can allot it to anyone.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In the form in which it is stated in the next paragraph—

In case such inmate has not allotted three-fourths of his monthly compensation, regulations to be made by the director may provide that any unallotted portion of such three-fourths compensation may be deposited to his credit with the Secretary of the Treasury—

And so forth. If the man does not make the allotment, then the director may take out three-fourths of his monthly compensation——

Mr. SWEET. No; not the director. All this is voluntary, but it has to be done under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the director.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In other words, there is no compulsory process whatever?

Mr. SWEET. None whatever, in no part of section 12.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that, where a soldier in one of these hospitals has a wife dependent upon him, a part of the compensation allotted to him must go to his wife?

Mr. SWEET. Not necessarily. It is paid to him in the first instance. We will say that a man is temporarily totally disabled. If single, he receives $80. If he has a wife, he gets $90. If he has a wife and one child, he gets $95. If he has a wife and two children, he gets $100. Now, that is paid directly to the man.

Mr. McKENZIE. Absolutely; but under the law the wife has a right to a portion of that pay if she wants it.

Mr. SWEET. No; not from the Government.

Mr. McKENZIE. But, however, when she asks for it does not the bureau see that she receives it?

Mr. SWEET. Not necessarily, except in cases where they live apart.

Mr. McKENZIE. That has been my experience.

Mr. SWEET. I hope that is true; but as a legal proposition it is not true. The money is payable to the man, and he has full authority over it.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a question. I do so in order to get his interpretation for the RECORD. What meaning does the gentleman from Iowa give to the word "may," in line 13, page 12? Does that have the meaning of the word "shall," or is it to be understood as optional with the director?

Mr. SWEET. That is purely optional.

Mr. DENISON. In other words, the section reads now—

In case such inmate has not allotted three-fourths of his monthly compensation, regulations to be made by the director may provide that any unallotted portion of such three-fourths compensation may be deposited to his credit with the Secretary of the Treasury to accumulate at such rate of interest as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine.

Does that mean, as the chairman of the subcommittee understands it, that when the beneficiary fails to allot three-fourths of his compensation, then such portion of that three-fourths of his compensation as has not been allotted by him may be set aside by the director, or shall be set aside by the director?

Mr. SWEET. No; not "shall," but "may." It says "may." It is purely voluntary.

Mr. DENISON. Voluntary on whose part?

Mr. SWEET. On the part of the man whether he allots it or not.

Mr. DENISON. If that was the intention of the gentleman from Iowa, the language of the bill does not carry out that intention, in my judgment. The language used seems to give the director of the bureau the right to place any of the unallotted part of the three-fourths of the beneficiary's compensation in the Treasury of the United States for the beneficiary.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly under the provision of that section that right is granted to the director. He may or may not exercise it, but certainly if he determines to exercise it, he has the right to exercise it whether the soldier consents or not.

Mr. DENISON. That is what I was calling to the attention of the gentleman from Iowa, because it seemed to me that we have here given the director the right to do that. Now, if we do not intend to do that, then there should be some slight change in the language we have used.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to line 6, on page 10—

All patients or beneficiaries of the veterans' bureau who are receiving treatment through the bureau as inmates of a hospital may allot any proportion or proportions or any fixed amount or amounts of their monthly compensation for such purposes and for the benefit of such person or persons as they may direct.

That leaves the matter entirely to the soldiers, as the beneficiaries may direct. If they do not make any direction with reference to it, that leaves it to their option.

Mr. TOWNER. That is provided for specifically. "In case such inmate has not allotted"—that is, if he has exercised himself the right he can not be interfered with by the director. If he has not himself allotted, the power is given to the director to exercise it or not as he sees fit. If he does exercise that power, it is not subject to the control of the soldier at all.

Mr. DENISON. That is the way it seemed to me, but I was not sure that the subcommittee intended it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DENISON. Certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think the gentleman is absolutely right, but I do not think it is of any earthly importance, because the provision is that if the director allots this money and it is put at interest it only draws interest in the event that it remains there for six months. It may be collected by the soldier at any time, but he does not get any interest unless it is in the hands of the Secretary for six months. So the only possible effect is that if he wants to get interest he has to leave it there six months.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; he can withdraw it at any time before or after the six months' period.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; but he does not get any interest unless it remains there for six months.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question in regard to the proviso beginning on line 23, page 10, which reads as follows:

Provided, That this paragraph shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amounts due to the decedent's estate of his funeral expenses, expenses of last illness, board, rent, lodging, or other household expenses for which decedent is liable, provided a claim therefor is presented by the creditors or by the person or persons who actually paid the same before settlement by the veterans' bureau.

As I understand, the bureau now has the power to pay emergency claims—for instance, if funeral expenses are to be guaranteed, the bureau can incur that expense, and this is to preserve that right. But it does not seem to me that it is clear that the payment shall be made by the bureau. It seems to me that the word "bureau" ought to be inserted after the word "payment" in line 24. It provides that in case the soldier dies and leaves no beneficiary the property shall be turned over to the executor or administrator, but it does not say by whom the payment shall be made.

Mr. SWEET. The last sentence makes it plain.

Mr. BRIGGS. The executor might go ahead and pay it without any authority, and I think the word "bureau" ought to be inserted.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The word "bureau" or the word "director."

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, it should be plain that it was to be paid by the veterans' bureau. I do not think it makes any difference whether you use the word "bureau" or "director."

Mr. SWEET. I think the gentleman's suggestion is all right.

Mr. BRIGGS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment that after the word "payment," in line 24, page 10, the words "by the bureau" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 24, after the word "payment," insert the words "by the bureau."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II.—AMENDMENTS TO THE WAR RISK INSURANCE ACT.

SEC. 15. Section 29 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 29. The discharge or dismissal of any person from the military or naval forces on the ground that he is an enemy alien, conscientious objector, or a deserter, or is guilty of mutiny, treason, spying, or any offense involving moral turpitude, or willful and persistent misconduct shall terminate any insurance granted on the life of such person under the provisions of article 4, and shall bar all rights to any compensation under article 3 or any insurance under article 4: Provided, That, as to converted insurance, the cash surrender value thereof, if any, on the date of such discharge or dismissal shall be paid the insured, if living, and, if dead, to the designated beneficiary."

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HICKEY: After the word "beneficiary," page 10, line 25, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add "Provided further, That an enemy alien who volunteered or who was drafted into the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the World War, and whose service was honest and faithful, shall be entitled to the benefit of the war risk insurance act."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HICKEY. If the gentleman wishes to make a point of order against the amendment, I prefer to have that disposed of now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will reserve a point of order. I would like to get a little information as to what the gentleman has in his mind as a reason for the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to extend the benefits of the war risk insurance act to men who were drafted into the military service of the United States and men who volunteered and served during the World War and whose services were honest and faithful.

Mr. BLANTON. There was not any enemy alien drafted into the service.

Mr. HICKEY. The gentleman from Texas is very much mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. Under what law?

Mr. HICKEY. The gentleman is mistaken. If the gentleman will wait a moment, I will explain. After the passage of the selective draft act there was considerable confusion with respect to the status of many men enrolled for military service. In my district, in the city of Michigan City, we had a large number of Syrians. Many of these men were drafted into the military service of the United States, and some of them served until after the armistice.

Mr. LAYTON. And served voluntarily.

Mr. HICKEY. Served voluntarily. There were other nationalities called to the colors through the draft boards, placed in class 1, and entered the military service of the United States and served honorably until after the close of the war.

Last summer several of these cases came to my attention. The officers under whom they served issued them certificates, not honorable and not dishonorable discharge certificates, but wrote into the certificates that the service of the men was honest and faithful and in many instances that the service was excellent. I took these cases up with the War Department and finally submitted them to the then Secretary of War, Mr. Baker. The facts were considered carefully by the War Department, and finally certificates of honorable discharge were issued to the men.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. This section applies to insurance.

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where these enemy aliens entered the Army for any reason and took out insurance, is that not the matter of contract, and is it necessary to have the gentleman's amendment agreed to in order to have the Government perform its part of the transaction?

Mr. HICKEY. It also relates to compensation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not this.

Mr. HICKEY. The war risk insurance act. If the gentleman will examine the amendment, he will see that it applies to the war risk insurance act, and that it seeks to amend the war risk insurance act so as to confer the benefits of the act upon all service men who rendered honorable service during the World War and upon men who were honorably discharged from the service.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Were these men alien enemies?

Mr. HICKEY. The men I have in mind were born in Syria and came to this country. During the war they were classed by the War Department as alien enemies because they were subjects of the Government of Turkey.

Mr. BARKLEY. But we were never at war with Turkey.

Mr. HICKEY. No; but the War Department classed them as enemy aliens.

Mr. BARKLEY. The law does not so class them.

Mr. HICKEY. But the War Department did, and they have been so classed since that time by different departments of the Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the alien enemy property act we define what an alien enemy is.

Mr. DENISON. I may be wrong in my recollection, but I do not think we declared war on Turkey.

Mr. HICKEY. They were subjects of Turkey.

Mr. DENISON. We never declared war on Turkey.

Mr. HICKEY. No; but the War Department placed them in the class of enemy aliens and the Bureau of Naturalization very recently refused citizenship papers to men in this class, because it held that they were enemy aliens. The question is arising frequently and interfering with the rights of these men to be benefited by this amendment should it be accepted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Since I interrogated the gentleman a while ago, I recall that the alien enemy property act provides that not only shall the nationals of an enemy but of any ally of the enemy be regarded as an enemy. It may be upon that ground that the War Department held that they were not entitled to the benefits of this act.

Mr. HICKEY. That is the fact.

Mr. RAYBURN. This amendment just covers men who have honorable discharges in the Army?

Mr. HICKEY. It covers men whose service was honest and faithful.

Mr. RAYBURN. How are you going to determine that?

Mr. HICKEY. By the records in the War Department. So far as I know the men in whom I am interested, with the exception of one, have been granted honorable discharges, but it may be that over the country there are other men in this class who have not been granted honorable discharges. I prepared my amendment to help those as well as the men in whom I am interested.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's amendment would embrace men who really had not done service in the Army and who did not have a discharge.

Mr. HICKEY. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of facilitating the work of another committee and for no other purpose, I propose now to move that the committee rise, but with the idea of going back into the committee after a few moments. I trust gentlemen will understand the situation and approve of it. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. STAFFORD having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6611, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SECOND DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6300, to insist on the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 1, and agree to the further conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6300, to insist on the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 1, and agree to the further conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May we have stated to the House what that amendment No. 1 is?

Mr. GOOD. Amendment No. 1 was an amendment placed on the bill in the Senate appropriating $10,000 for the Bureau of Efficiency. When we came to look into the matter we found that the director of the bureau had stated to the Committee on Appropriations of the House that there had been no increases of salary during the present year, yet on further investigation we found that his salary had been increased by $4,000, and another salary by $1,000, and another by $500, and so the House has adopted as an amendment to the Senate amendment a proviso that no salary in excess of $7,500 shall be paid during the rest of this year and next year, and that the other salaries shall be those provided for and will be paid at the beginning of the present fiscal year. The Senate has refused to agree to that amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As I understand, that is the only remaining matter of difference between the two bodies?

Mr. GOOD. That is the only matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Iowa state what the salary of the Chief of the Efficiency Bureau would be?

Mr. GOOD. It was $6,000 at the beginning of the year, but his salary was increased to $10,000, which is an increase of $4,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Ten thousand dollars for chief of that bureau?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; from $6,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I happen to know something about his efficiency. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what did the House conferees do in regard to the so-called half-and-half proposition?

Mr. GOOD. That is the provision in regard to the proportion of payments by the District and the Federal Governments?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The District pays 60 per cent and the Federal Treasury 40 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the Senate accepted the House's action?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair asks authority to appoint conferees. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. GOOD, CANNON, and BYRNS of Tennessee.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Massachusetts preparing to move to adjourn?

Mr. WINSLOW. No; I am going to move to go back into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6611.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6611, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6611, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama insist on his point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know the opinion of the chairman of the committee in reference to this amendment. It seems to me that under the statement made it presents a rather equitable case for relief of these men.

Mr. SWEET. I am of the same opinion, but I am somewhat in doubt, the way the amendment is worded, as to whether it will simply take care of those who were drafted into the Army and afterwards were dismissed because of the fact they were alien enemies. Now, the amendment states that whenever they have "rendered faithful and honest service," and the question naturally rises, who is going to determine that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The proponent of the amendment said that would be done by the War Department, but, as the gentleman suggests, it is a very indefinite, inaccurate description.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I was going to suggest that the term "honest and faithful" has a certain technical significance in the War Department. That is to say, a soldier discharged under certain conditions is mentioned as "honest and faithful," and in another discharge is marked "excellent," and in another is marked "fair." The general public does not understand, but it means something definite in the War Department. I do not know the language in which the gentleman's amendment is framed, but if it contains the particular reference to the term "honest and faithful" it will have a particular significance if properly used.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to call to the attention of the gentleman who offered the amendment that the amendment only gives him the benefit of the original war risk insurance act, and if he desires him to get the full benefit he ought to amend it so as to quote the amendments that have been made to the original act. I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. SWEET. I make no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. That it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It seems to me the amendment is clearly germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 29 of the pending bill, to which the provision of the gentleman from Indiana is offered as an amendment, deals with the termination of insurance or of compensation under the war risk insurance act by virtue of the discharge or dismissal of any person from the military and naval service, on the ground that he is an enemy alien, conscientious objector, or a deserter, and so forth. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana provides that—

An enemy alien who volunteered or was drafted into the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the war and whose service was honest and faithful shall be entitled to the benefits of the war risk insurance act.

The Chair thinks the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is germane to the section under consideration and overrules the point of order.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It seems to me before we adopt this particular amendment we ought to carefully consider just what it may lead to.

In discussing this question let us bear in mind that, in general, men of foreign birth and of native origin responded to the call of the declaration of a state of war on the 6th of April, 1917. The battle fields of Europe bear eloquent testimony to the fact that native-born and foreign-born Americans unselfishly paid the last supreme measure of devotion that this country might live. It was my privilege to visit the battle field in and around the Madelaine farm in the Argonne Forest. There were something like 550 graves there, which have since that time been removed to the main cemetery at Romaigne. I counted something like 11 or 12 different nationalities among the names marked upon the white crosses that dotted that small field.

While all of this is true, we should not let this fact blind us to the other fact, namely, that while many declarants completed their citizenship in the service many others refused to do so, and were discharged by virtue of a presidential order. Thousands of aliens who had not yet declared their intention of becoming citizens claimed and received exemption from service before the draft boards. Thousands of others who did not claim exemption upon induction into the service received their discharge after their induction into the service and by reason of their right as aliens. In other words, these latter folks were willing to receive all of the benefits of American citizenship and of American residence, but were willing to perform none of the duties or obligations accompanying them.

The nationals of an alien foreign country can be compelled to render military service under international law, because of the fact that, being residents of that country, they are receiving benefits and are therefore held to certain obligations. There are exceptions to this, where by treaty arrangements exemption from this service is stipulated. An alien enemy can not be forced to do military service, because that would be compelling him to serve against his own country.

The selective draft act of May 18, 1917, called upon "all male citizens or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention" of becoming citizens. The courts early held that the burden of proof was upon the draftee to establish his exemption. It was further held that this exemption could, of course, be waived by any alien enemy. During the war there was a total of 3,877,083 aliens who registered for the draft. Of these 1,270,182 were declarants, while 2,606,901 were nondeclarants. Of this total of nearly 4,000,000, 414,389 aliens were placed in class I. Of these, 160,594 were declarants, while nondeclarants numbered 253,795.

The total number of alien enemies registered were 432,909, of which 40,552 were placed in class I. This number was made up of 16,834 declarants and 23,718 nondeclarants. Of the total of alien enemies registered for the draft there were placed in class V–E 334,949. In other words, over 300,000 were placed in the deferred classification as alien enemies by the draft boards. These men made no attempt to get into the Army.

Now, then, of the total number of enemy aliens entering the Army there were discharged by Executive order from the camps in America 5,637.

I have no doubt but that some of the men discharged by reason of the Executive order, and which were included undoubtedly in this total of 5,637, were men who would have preferred to stay, but through misunderstanding neglected or were prevented from stating their desire to continue to serve. In fact, I have in mind a particular case of a man born in Czechoslovakia, then a part of Austria. He had served in the Minnesota National Guard preceding the outbreak of the war. He readily became federalized with his outfit upon our entry into the Great War. Upon the publishing of the Executive order permitting his discharge as an alien enemy, and its attempted application to him, he protested and endeavored to remain in the service. He was prevented from doing so because it was the impression of his officers that his discharge was mandatory. Personally, I feel that provision for a man with a service record of this kind could be cared for by a proper amendment. On the other hand, I do not want to pass an amendment which will confer benefits of the war risk insurance act upon the thousands who took their discharge gladly because they were enemy aliens.

If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, in the terms in which it was drawn, he would grant all the privileges of the war risk insurance act to those men who were discharged under this Executive order, notwithstanding they did not protest against the discharge. Its provisions are so broad as to confer the benefits upon those who sought and claimed exemption. And unless his amendment is so modified as to provide that it shall only include those men who were forced out of the service against their will and against their consent I do not see that I can support it.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I recall in the final report of the provost general, Gen. Crowder, a discussion of the effect of this Executive order; that there were thousands of cases of men who were separated from the service as the result of those orders to which the gentleman has alluded. Now, my recollection is very clear that the overwhelming majority of those cases coveted the opportunity to get out.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There is no question about it.

Mr. ROGERS. They went in against their will and jumped at a chance to get out. If it is true, as the gentleman suggests, that the amendment covers that kind of a case I do not think there is much justification in accepting it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I see no reason why, if the gentleman has a particular case where a man was forced out of the Army against his consent, that his amendment can not be so modified as to include only that class.

Mr. LAYTON. Do you not think that an alien, whether an alien enemy or an alien of any sort, that was taken into the service, whether he went in as a volunteer or as a draftee, and served in the war, ought to be treated the same as anybody else?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What does the gentleman mean by his having served in the war? Does he mean that he went into a cantonment and served there for two or three months and when the Executive order was issued he gladly got out? Does the gentleman mean he should be granted all these privileges?

Mr. LAYTON. I mean he had absolute service, whether it happened in a camp or across the water.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman would include that class along with the worthy ones?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the House publish a list of all those who served in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, and of those who made the supreme sacrifice in the World War. I ask that this list be published, preferably by States.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that should be asked in the committee. It has nothing to do with the pending legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may make a request to extend his remarks in the committee if he wishes to do so. It would be in the discretion of the House to grant it or not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Chairman, did not ask to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I have no remarks to publish on this subject. I simply ask that this list be published in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it would not be in order.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, during the period of the war and for some time afterwards there were a great many loose statements made in regard to the number of aliens, including enemy aliens, that dodged the draft, and one would think by reading the newspapers and by hearing the debates in Congress that there were literally hundreds of thousands of those men who dodged the draft. The figures showed that they amounted to only 1,600.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes. Aliens were not entitled to be drafted.

Mr. MADDEN. Enemy aliens were not. Nobody but citizens were entitled to be drafted.

Mr. FISH. I think the law to that effect was amended afterwards.

Mr. MADDEN. The law provided that they should be drafted if they had declared their intention to become citizens; but their respective countries objected to that, and afterwards that was waived.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman from New York, I am sure, does not want to make a misstatement.

Mr. FISH. Certainly I do not.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman has in mind evidently those who went into court and took corrective action to have their declaration of an intention to become citizens withdrawn or annulled. But there were thousands who did not follow that course and who were included in the draft. The gentleman no doubt has in mind the 1,600 who took affirmative action to annul the papers that had already been started.

Mr. FISH. There were almost 500,000 aliens or alien enemies in the Army, and there were only 1,600 who availed themselves of the opportunity of dodging the draft. It seems to me we should not make any distinction between men who actually served in the armies of the United States. If these men were good enough to be called or drafted into the service and wear the uniform of the United States, they are good enough to be entitled to all the benefits of this act, just as much as an American soldier who may have served for one day or one week and went out for one cause or other.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I favor this amendment if it can be safeguarded; but I have in mind an instance where a man claimed he was a citizen of Germany, and on that ground claimed release from service in the Army. He went on through the drill and did all they told him, and he was never court-martialed; but he asked to be discharged under the law, and the law gave him that right, and he was discharged. I maintain that the War Department can not find that his service was not faithful when he served.

The gentleman's amendment appeals to me. If he made the request to get out of the Army because he was an enemy, he could not accept the benefits of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] agrees to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HICKEY], and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I offer that as an amendment to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] offers an amendment to the pending amendment. Will the gentleman from New York send it up to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It should read, "who was not discharged upon his own application by reason of his being an alien."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HICKEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH to the amendment offered by Mr. HICKEY: At the end of the amendment strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "who was not discharged from the Army on his own application by reason of his being an alien enemy."

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. "On the ground of his being an alien enemy."

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a great deal of interest in this proposition and considerable uncertainty as to the accuracy of the language. In order that we may discuss the matter fairly and fully, I ask unanimous consent to pass over this amendment with the right to return to it later on.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment or the section?

Mr. WINSLOW. The amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the amendment be passed over temporarily with the right to return to it at a later time. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I understand it applies only to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. To the amendment and amendments to the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 12, line 25, after the word "beneficiaries," strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided further, That in case any person who has been dishonorably discharged from the military or naval forces as a result of a court-martial trial, and it is thereafter established to the satisfaction of the President that at the time of the commission of the offense resulting in such court-martial trial and discharge such person was insane, the President may direct and cause to be issued to such person an honorable discharge, and the person receiving such honorable discharge shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of the war risk insurance act.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the committee that it strikes me that the justice of this amendment should appeal to every Member of the House. I dare say it would not apply to very many persons; but I have in my own district a case, and I have heard of two other cases, where men were charged with offenses, tried in a hurry by a court-martial, found guilty, and sentenced to the penitentiary. In the case I have in mind it is perfectly apparent, and the record discloses, that at the time the young man was sentenced from overseas to the penitentiary in the United States he was insane. The evidence established beyond peradventure, had the trial been in court, that before this young man entered the Army he had a sick spell that resulted in aberrations of mind and that he was confined in a sanitarium for a number of years. It was thought he had recovered. He was ambitious to get into the Army. He did get in. He committed an offense and was convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary. He was confined there until he became so insane that they could not treat him there, when he was paroled in order that his friends might place him in an insane asylum, where he now is and where he will probably die. There is no question in the mind of anybody who knows the facts in this case but that at the time the young man committed the offense for which he was tried he was insane. There is not a court in this land that would take away from that man, under those facts, any right of his or that would divest him of his property. When this Congress is attempting to provide all the privileges and benefits possible for the amelioration of the suffering and for the benefit of those who offered and gave their all, it can not afford to make a distinction that would reflect no credit upon us, but that would deny to the unfortunate few who are situated like this young man the rights and privileges of this bill.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SWEET. Do I understand the gentleman correctly that he is maintaining the proposition that any young man who was insane and who during the period of that insanity lost certain rights in regard to his insurance, and the like of that, should be entitled to receive the benefits of this bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. SWEET. Or in case where such a man was court-martialed?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; if insane at the time.

Mr. SWEET. The object of the gentleman's amendment is to take care of just such cases as that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is the purpose of it exactly, and only where the President is convinced that at the time the offense was committed the man who was court-martialed was insane. If he was insane, he could not commit the offense. There is no chance for abuse of the provision.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Would not the effect of the gentleman's amendment be to permit the reopening of practically every case where there was a dishonorable discharge for court-martial, and permit going into the question of insanity over again?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it would only admit those cases where the War Department is satisfied that the man was insane.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. But the time has long since elapsed. Any man who wanted to get back his status of an honorable discharge could take the whole thing up again and go into his mental condition at the time the offense was committed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The burden is on the man who demands to do that, or on his friends.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is true; but it would permit him to open up the question in each case where we have had an adjudication by court-martial and where there was an opportunity to raise the question of insanity.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, take the case that I have in mind: The hardship of the whole thing here was that the man had no mind with which to act; and it takes a man with some mind to act.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It may be that the man was poorly defended or that the question was not raised; but there is always a full and free opportunity in every court-martial for a man to be defended.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is the presumption, but sometimes it is a violent one.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to ask whether the gentleman's amendment is limited to cases which occurred between the declaration of war and the armistice?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My amendment does not limit it directly, but the language is such that, I think, that would be the construction of it.

Mr. ROGERS. This very bill we are now discussing recognizes the distinction that was made between presumption of soundness in war time and presumption of soundness in peace time in cases of recruits. I think there is a good deal of force in the gentleman's amendment. I reserved a point of order; but if the gentleman would limit it to cases that occurred between the declaration of war and the armistice I would withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That would be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. Do I understand that the purpose of the gentleman is to give ex-service men suffering from insanity the same legal status that an insane person would have under the criminal and civil law of the respective States?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is it exactly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman's amendment applies to those suffering from insanity at the time the offense was committed?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. How is it possible to prove the sanity or insanity of a man years afterwards; if it is right at the time when the trial was had following the offense the conditions can be easily established. Years after the comrades about him are scattered, nobody knows anything about it, and if you leave it to the Executive instead of the court-martial, if you leave it to the President whether the man tried at a given time was sane or not——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is not the proposition at all. Take the case that I have in mind. The record in the case discloses that the whole thing happened within a few hours; he was arrested, and he had practically no trial at all; he had no defense—it was one of those instances where there was an abuse of the law of court-martial. I can not conceive how anybody could be wronged if the burden is on the person to show that at the time the offense was committed he was insane or of unsound mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say that it is perfectly agreeable to me to have the limit put in the amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will frame an appropriate amendment I will withdraw my reservation of the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will ask to modify my amendment by inserting the limit.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield before he modifies his amendment?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not exactly see just why this amendment should be adopted, but if it is right between the declaration of war and the signing of the armistice why should not it be right after? If it is a right thing to do before the 11th of November why is not it right afterwards?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. My point of order, Mr. Chairman, goes to the whole subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey makes the point of order.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I make the point of order that this bill deals with granting of war-risk insurance relief to persons in a certain status, and it does not deal with the setting aside of courts-martial or giving an honorable discharge. That is a matter of military law and not for this bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will read the section attempted to be amended by this amendment he will see that it applies to persons who were discharged from the military and naval forces on the ground that they were alien enemies, conscientious objectors, or deserters, or guilty of mutiny, treason, spying, or any offense involving moral turpitude. Suppose a soldier has been tried and convicted by court-martial, resulting in his dishonorable discharge, because of mutiny, because of some offense involving moral turpitude, because of any of the things specified in this section. The amendment is certainly germane because of the fact that the purpose of this bill is to extend under certain circumstances the provisions of this measure. This is attempting to extend it further by extending to those who have been tried and convicted by court-martial and who are found to have been insane at the time the offense of which they were convicted was committed.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, this section of the bill provides that certain facts shall terminate the insurance. The gentleman wishes to provide means of getting rid of the proceedings of court-martial, which would have terminated the insurance. He does not have anything to do with the insurance, but simply wants to have an honorable discharge granted to a man who has been court-martialed. That is a mattter of military discipline and not a matter relating to insurance as provided for in this bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The purpose of this is that he may have the benefits of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The provisions of section 29 do not deal directly with discharges or dismissals from the Army. They rather provide that persons who are discharged or dismissed for certain reasons shall not be entitled to the benefits of compensation or insurance under the provisions of the war risk insurance act. That is to say, the words with reference to discharge and dismissal are descriptive of the persons who are not entitled to the benefits of the war risk insurance act. It might be in order to provide by amendment that a person dishonorably discharged from the military or naval forces as a result of court-martial, who was insane at the time of such trial, might be entitled to the benefits of the war risk insurance act, but this amendment goes further than that. It authorizes the President to direct and cause to be issued to such a person an honorable discharge. The Chair is of opinion that this provision and this bill does not deal with discharges in such a way as to make an amendment which undertakes to authorize the discharge of a soldier from the Army germane to the provisions of the bill. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in view of the ruling of the Chair, and in order that I may submit an amendment that will meet with it, I shall ask unanimous consent that the proposed amendment which I desire to offer may go over for consideration later, the same as the other amendment went over.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, the situation in respect to these two amendments is entirely different. One was put over because of a desire to clarify language and the other goes out on a ruling of the Chair.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, there is another phase to this, if I may suggest it. There are a number who entered the service who were in France and who served in many of the engagements, who were under age, and who upon the application of some one here and upon the statement of facts to the department, were taken from the service and released without an honorable discharge. Without any action on their part they are unable to participate in the benefits of this bill, and they also should be joined in this amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman know of any such case? I am under the impression that the War Department has ruled otherwise.

Mr. DOWELL. I know of one case I took up with the department where a young man served in France——

The CHAIRMAN. All this is out of order.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, is there any reason why we can not have an objection enforced on a demand for the regular order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to submit the request to the House before objection is made.

Mr. WINSLOW. I understood that it had been submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that this matter go over for final consideration and examination with the other amendment which is now proposed to the same provision in order that I may have an opportunity to draw an amendment which will be in order and in no wise conflict with the progress of this bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the request, it is to present a modified amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts understood that it was to present the same amendment.

Mr. WINSLOW. I have no particular objection to the request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to offer an amendment to the section under consideration at a later time, although that section has been passed. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the gentleman can submit his request later as well as now, and I object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK. Was not this section passed for amendment until to-morrow?

The CHAIRMAN. The section was not passed. The request was that the gentleman be permitted to offer an amendment to this particular section at a later day notwithstanding the fact that the section has been passed over. The Chair does not understand the entire section was passed over, but that an amendment could be offered to it later.

Mr. BLACK. Very true; but there is a parliamentary inquiry I want to propound. That amendment will be subject to an amendment, and if the gentleman from Indiana proposes an amendment which is not subject to a point of order, there would be nothing to hinder him offering it.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the Chair knows now, it would not, but the Chair is not passing upon that question.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only thing passed over was the right to offer an amendment. The whole section was not passed.

Mr. BLACK. But that amendment could be amended by a proper amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; by a germane amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 25, after the word "beneficiary," strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided further, That in case any person has been dishonorably discharged from the military or naval forces as a result of a court-martial trial, and it is thereafter established to the satisfaction of the President that at the time of the commission of the offense resulting in such court-martial, trial, and discharge, that such person was insane, such person shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of the war risk insurance act."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not that the same amendment offered a moment ago?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, no; it is entirely different. It strikes out the phrase "The President may direct and cause to be issued to such person an honorable discharge," and so forth.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Now, cases which arise under the general law that are analogous to this present this situation: That whereas some other committee perhaps is charged with the preparation of legislation along the line of pensions or emoluments for service, the question of changing the status of a discharged man so that he can take advantage of this pension law will go to the Committee on Military Affairs. That is the long-standing practice of the House, and, if the gentleman will recall, the proposition is not to change the record, but the proposition that is submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs is that such and such a man shall be in a pensionable status.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is true; but that is under the old pension act, which is very different from the character of legislation we have to do with now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am getting at the general practice which seems to me ought to underlie all the practices of the House when the cases are analogous. It does not make any difference whether the details of the pension law differ from the details of this law; are not the circumstances identical? The man is discharged from the Army if he served in the Civil War or the War with Spain under conditions that would not permit him to receive the advantages of the pension law, and it is the same thing here. Whereupon we refer his case to the Committee on Military Affairs, and they will have a rehearing and reexamination that may restore his status so that he can take advantage of the pension laws.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That would be the only way to treat this, too, and what objection could there possibly be? I apprehend that the President of the United States would require the most positive proof that the person at the time was insane. It would be a great deal easier, no doubt, in a given case to get through a special bill, but it strikes me while we are enacting this character of legislation for the relief of all those who are entitled to it that the character of cases I have mentioned should come within the purview of it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to suggest there, because I am in sympathy in a great measure with the gentleman's intention, you are now proposing to enact a general law to get at special cases, which is contrary to good policy in any legislative body anywhere and results always in abuse, because its administration is charged upon the people who administer that general law and who are not prepared always to take care of special equity cases.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If you will take this bill from start to finish, you will find that it applies to special cases.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then it is to that extent wrong.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I add one more special case to it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not this a further development of the thought of the gentleman from Vermont, that it is turning over to the Executive what is absolutely a legislative matter?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Absolutely.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And is not this in line with special pension cases, where you have to get your honorable discharge or the record straightened before the committee will consider it? Is not that legislative and not executive?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would not be considered legislative in any event. If anything, it is judicial. You are referring it to the President for the purposes of determining judicially.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to close debate on this.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to have five minutes on this amendment.

Mr. WINSLOW. The chairman of the committee is in rather an unhappy situation. He has in mind that a motion was made by him and carried some considerable time ago, some 40 minutes, that the debate end in 10 minutes, and time was given to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] on this section. We have run on now for about half an hour rather than to disappoint anybody.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman has not heard any remarks from me at all.

Mr. WINSLOW. And we have thought of enforcing that 10-minute regulation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware that any limit was placed on this section; in that, he is confirmed by everybody now at the desk. If the gentleman desires to make a motion the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman need not make it on my account.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were—ayes 35, noes 30.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair thinks there is no quorum present.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. STAFFORD having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6611, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent for permission to be given to the Members to extend their remarks for five legislative days on this bill, H. R. 6611.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman confine it to their own remarks rather than to tables and literature, and things of that kind?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts modify his request?

Mr. WINSLOW. I would like to modify my request by adding thereto the request that they be obliged to confine the extension to their own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman modifies his original request by placing the limitation that they shall be confined to their own remarks. Is there objection to the request as modified? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the gentlemen who may not be here, I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question for the benefit of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. I wish the gentleman from Wyoming would make a statement for the RECORD with reference to when we will vote on the peace resolution. There have been a great many inquiries about it, and it is a matter of considerable importance.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that the rule for the consideration of the peace resolution will be presented immediately after the conclusion of the consideration of the bill now before the House. And we hope to have a vote on it Saturday afternoon.

Mr. GARNER. Let me ask the gentleman if his information is not to the effect that the rule will provide that the vote shall occur at 5 o'clock on Saturday afternoon?

Mr. MONDELL. At half-past 4 or 5 on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. GARNER. Then the vote will be, if I understand the gentleman from Wyoming, on Saturday afternoon at 4 or 5 o'clock?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and the sooner we reach the peace resolution the more opportunity there will be for debate on that resolution. And if the gentleman from Texas will allow me, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a short article from the Manufacturers' Record relative to the financial situation as affecting the manufacturers of the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the article referred to by him. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, in the confusion I did not hear the mention of the article referred to.

Mr. KING. It is a short article stating the financial condition of the manufacturers of the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the article referred to:

[From Manufacturers Record, June 2, 1921.]

On November 14, 1919, a high-powered automobile, containing four people, drove into the town of Pierce, Nebr., and stopped in front of the Cones State Bank. The engine was kept running. Two men, armed with revolvers, got out of the car and entered the institution. As agents of the Federal reserve bank, they presented checks to the aggregate value of $31,900, for which they demanded cash, declining to accept drafts. These checks represented an accumulation of items which had been brought together over a period of more than three weeks. One of these Federal reserve agents stated to the officers of the bank that the other agent "was a United States marshal, hard-boiled and armed; that he had cleaned up the State of Kansas and would get us anyway" unless the Cones State Bank signed an agreement to follow the orders of the Federal reserve bank. These agents also stated that where a State bank declined to obey orders, it was certain to be driven to the wall by the power of the Federal reserve system, which was really the Government of the United States. The case is not an isolated one. It is typical of what was done in hundreds of cases by the gunmen of the Federal reserve bank. The methods of coercion used and threatened were:

"1. The Federal Reserve Board would accumulate checks on a State institution until the gross amount of such checks exceeded the amount of currency said State bank was required to carry in its vaults or was likely to have on hand. It would then send men armed with guns to demand payment. If payment could not be made in cash, the checks were protested and the news spread about town that the bank was being questioned by the Government, the result of which would be to cause a run on the bank. But if the bank, threatened by such disaster, signed an agreement to obey the illegal orders of the Federal reserve bank, then cash for checks was not required, but drafts were accepted at par.

"2. If the first method of coercion failed, the State banks in small towns were notified that a competing national bank would be organized to drive them out of business; that such national bank would be supported with the full power of the Federal reserve bank, against which no small State bank could hope to wage a successful fight.

"3. If both of these methods of coercion failed, the State bank was warned that its correspondents in the cities would be prevented thereafter from extending it any accommodations, would call its loans, and would drive it into bankruptcy."

The above facts are taken from the sworn testimony of witnesses before the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives, May 4, 5, and 6, 1920. They give a mere inkling of the truth as revealed by the full testimony, copies of which can be procured from the Government Printing Office, under the title "Hearings Before the Committee on Rules on House Resolution 476, Sixty-sixth Congress."

The American Bank & Trust Co. appealed to the courts to prevent the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, Ga., from continuing lawless assaults of the sort outlined above. The case finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States, which had before it much of the evidence which was brought out at the hearing to which we have referred. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Holmes, and never before, perhaps, in the history of that august tribunal has such a scathing denunciation of official lawlessness been delivered as the following:

"The defendants (Federal reserve bank) say that the holder of a check has the right to present it to the bank upon which it was drawn for payment over the counter, and that however many checks he may hold he has the same right as to all of them and may present them all at once, whatever his motive or intent. They ask whether a mortgagee would be prevented from foreclosing because he acted from disinterested malevolence and not from a desire to get his money. But the word 'right' is one of the most deceptive of pitfalls; it is so easy to slip from a qualified meaning in the premise to an unqualified one in the conclusion. Most rights are qualified. A man has at least as absolute a right to give his own money as he has to demand money from a party that has made no promise to him; yet if he gives it to induce another to steal or murder, the purpose of the act makes it a crime.

"A bank that receives deposits to be drawn upon by check of course authorizes its depositors to draw checks against their accounts and holders of such checks to present them for payment. When we think of the ordinary case the right of the holder is so unimpeded that it seems to us absolute. But looked at from either side it can not be so. The interests of business also are recognized as rights, protected against injury to a greater or less extent, and in case of conflict between the claims of business on the one side and of third persons on the other lines have to be drawn that limit both. A man has a right to give advice, but advice given for the sole purpose of injuring another's business and effective on a large scale might create a cause of action. Banks, as we know them, could not exist if they could not rely upon averages and lend a large part of the money that they receive from their depositors on the assumption that not more than a certain fraction of it will be demanded on any one day. If without a word of falsehood but acting from what we have called disinterested malevolence a man by persuasion should organize and carry into effect a run upon a bank and ruin it, we can not doubt that an action would lie. A similar result, even if less complete in its effect, is to be expected from the course that the defendants are alleged to intend, and to determine whether they are authorized to follow that course it is not enough to refer to the general right of a holder of checks to present them but it is necessary to consider whether the collection of checks and presenting them in a body for the purpose of breaking down the petitioner's business as now conducted is justified by the ulterior purpose in view.

"If this were a case of competition in private business, it would be hard to admit the justification of self-interest, considering the now current opinion as to public policy expressed in statutes and decisions. But this is not private business. The policy of the Federal reserve banks is governed by the policy of the United States with regard to them and to these relatively feeble competitors. We do not need aid from the debates upon the statute under which the reserve banks exist to assume that the United States did not intend by that statute to sanction this sort of warfare upon legitimate creations of the States."

Warfare! Warfare by the Federal Reserve Board against creatures of the State over whom the board had been warned by a definite opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, addressed to the President on March 21, 1918, in response to his request, that the Federal reserve act "does not command or compel these State banks to forego any right they may have under the State laws to make charges in connection with the payment of checks drawn upon them," and it was notorious that CARTER GLASS, in presenting the conference report for the adoption of the act to the House, had definitely explained and promised that the Federal Reserve Board had no control over the operation of nonmember banks unless they "voluntarily" joined the collection system.

When called to the stand a year ago to explain the barbarous operations of his agents, Gov. W. P. G. Harding, as usual, pleaded ignorance in some cases and in some others evaded the issue. He has the reputation of being what professional men call a "clever witness." But he could not quite get away from the persistence of Congressman REAVIS, of Nebraska, who finally forced these admissions:

"Mr. REAVIS. What I want to get into this record is the fact that whenever these nonmember banks will sign the agreement to do that thing, which in law you can not force them to do, you accept exchange from them.

Gov. HARDING. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. And when they refuse you demand cash and refuse to accept exchange.

Gov. HARDING. It appears in some cases that that has been done.

It was habitually done, not one time but thousands of times. Indeed, so indignant were some gentlemen at the seeming lack of definite knowledge on the part of Gov. Harding that the following day Mr. Alexander Smith, of Atlanta, attorney for the assaulted banks, said: "In view of the statement yesterday by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board that these things were not being done with his knowledge and consent, I wish to introduce an original letter from Mr. E. P. Tyner, assistant cashier of the Federal reserve bank of Kansas City, dated December 3, 1919, containing this paragraph:

"'Our action in adding the entire State of Missouri to the par list was taken at the request and with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board at Washington,'" etc.

Moreover, it was testified by Mr. Claiborne, of the Whitney Central National Bank, of New Orleans:

"You (Congress) then refused to create a central bank in Washington. but what you have to-day is really a central bank in Washington. They are attempting to make out of these local boards, boards which must submit absolutely to what Washington says. Those boards are not permitted to act for themselves; they get their instructions and advices from Washington."

We emphasize this point because Gov. Harding last December professed to be ignorant of the contents of instructions issued by the Federal reserve bank of Richmond demanding drastic restriction of credit and rather sought to make it appear that our publication of these orders in their essential form was misleading and, if not misleading, could not be held to be representative of the policy of the Federal Reserve Board. Each of the 12 regional banks is absolutely dominated by the board in Washington. They have no basic policies except those handed to them from Washington. The evidence all shows most conclusively that Gov. Harding was not only cognizant of what the Richmond bank was doing all last year, but that he was equally cognizant at all times of the at-the-pistol-point methods whereby his agents were attempting to coerce country banks.

At this hearing a year ago Gov. Harding boasted that the lower court had sustained the right of the Federal Reserve Board to accumulate checks and present them in bunches. He emphasized that very point. All he wanted to do, he said, was to carry out the law. But the case got to the Supreme Court of the United States. It, too, reversing the lower court, dwelt at length on just this very point, as is noted above. It went out of its way to discuss this identical alleged "right" of the board to collect checks in such a way as to destroy small banks.

In the face of the decision Gov. Harding at once prepared or had prepared a statement for the press in which he ignored the court's overwhelming condemnation of the Federal Reserve Board's policy and dwelt on the fact that the decision itself related to an issue of pleading, which was true enough technically but not otherwise. He then went on to say:

"The Supreme Court's decision will not interfere with the present check-clearing functions of the Federal reserve banks, and those banks will continue, as heretofore, to collect checks drawn upon those banks which are listed upon the par lists."

If that meant what the public thinks it means—what any but an expert would assume it to mean—Gov. Harding could not remain in office one week. Before the authority of the Supreme Court had been established thoroughly in our system of government, a President, it is true, did feign to ignore its mandates, but there is no man big enough to do so to-day, from the President down, and none, save a bolshevist, would make the attempt. Gov. Harding does not mean to say that he will continue collections by lead-pipe methods. He says he will continue to clear checks upon those banks "which are listed upon the par lists." Of course he will, because that is not the issue at all. What the Supreme Court has said is that he shall not coerce banks not on the "par lists" and force them to get on those lists. And he will not. He will not because the days of his dominance are numbered and the new influence in power in the board would never for one moment permit him, with all his arrogance, to ignore a mandate of the supreme tribunal or spit upon the law and flag. No doubt he would like to do it, but he has been shorn of some of his power by the drastic decision of the Supreme Court. Yesterday it was the new administration that was reversing the whole Gov. Harding policy of ruin and destruction. To-day it is the Supreme Court which denounces him and his former associates as having waged warfare against State banks with ruthlessness beyond the power of words to adequately describe. It is a terrible accusation—more terrible than any the Manufacturers' Record has heretofore made against the Federal Reserve Board. Indeed, in view of the facts that are coming out, we are amazed at our own moderation. We are even more amazed that this conspiracy against the public weal by public officers has been able to remain so long concealed and that even now the press refrains, for some reason or other, from giving proper publicity to the awful blunders which have been made. Has it, too, been coerced and is the Federal Reserve Board, with its gunmen and Apaches, driving the Nation into another Jackson fight to restore the financial liberties of the people?

What is a bolshevist? We know not how many millions or billions Lenin and Trotski have wiped out of existence. We do know that the operation of the Federal Reserve Board last year "wiped off the slate as with a sponge" $25,000,000,000 of the national wealth of the United States. In sheer destructiveness it challenges bolshevism at its worst. And now we have the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, when branded by the Supreme Court with having waged warfare against the State banks and with operation of a generally lawless policy, putting out a statement purporting, except to experts, to mean that he will not cease from that warfare but will continue in arrogant lawlessness. There is the spirit, if not the fact, of bolshevism in the pronouncement. Much power has made the man mad. He has been so long the master he has forgotten he is a servant. "This divine-right thing" testifies a banker, "descends upon people very insidiously. The minute they get the authority they get the idea in their heads that anything they say should be done must be done and anybody who dares to contradict that becomes a criminal." It is even worse than that, for this man has not only overruled the Congress of the United States by forcing on the country a central bank in defiance of orders not to; he has not only set himself up as an arbiter of prices and by deliberate intent broken the markets and pursued a policy which Abraham Lincoln denounced aforetime as dishonest and criminal; he has not only set in motion his desperadoes to destroy the State banking system in the United States in order that all financial authority may reside in himself and he become an absolute dictator of the Nation's credit facilities, but he has, in addition, when his lawlessness has been exposed by the Supreme Court, had the insolence and impertinence to make a public statement which gives the impression that he is going to continue in his ways despite the court or any other authority.

This man can not remain in office. He can not get out of office without an investigation. The thing has gone too far. A Congress that fails to look deep into the whole past conduct of the administration of Gov. Harding will be discredited before the polls are reached in the next election. An administration that kept him in power would be swept into oblivion the first chance the voters got. He must get out. Not until he is out will there be any confidence among business men in the United States. The whole institution of banking is under a cloud while he continues in office. He breathes a poisonous miasma over the entire financial administration in the United States. He exudes distrust and ruin.

They said of the second Adams that the touch of his hand was like ice and he chilled the heart of the Nation. The charge may not have been true, but a hand of ice is responsible for "frozen credits" in this great country to-day, and there will be no warmth again in commerce until the shadow of its owner's body no longer spreads its bolshevistic darkness into the far corners of the land.

Gov. Harding must get out! No man against whose actions the Supreme Court has rendered a decision couched in language probably never before used by that august tribunal can remain at the head of our Nation's banking system.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with the bill that we considered to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. On what subject?

Mr. HILL. In connection with the remarks made in opposition to my amendment, including some resolutions.

Mr. GARNER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DEAL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order, until to-morrow, Friday, June 10, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

158. SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 10, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our God and Father, we believe that Thou art, and art the rewarder of all them who diligently seek Thee. Thou art not to us an unknown or an unknowable God, and we bless Thee for the knowledge of this truth. May it take hold of us and bind us with deep and earnest consecration to highest ideals and noblest purposes for our country, for the world at large. We humbly ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House insisted on its amendment to the Senate amendment No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes; had agreed to the further conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that Mr. GOOD, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 86) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] is absent on official business.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is necessarily absent and that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CURTIS presented a resolution of the Atchison (Kans.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the enactment of legislation to provide adequate relief for disabled ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented two resolutions of Brick Grange, No. 1498, of Holton, and Lodge No. 216, Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, and Station Employees, of Chanute, both in the State of Kansas, opposing the enactment of a sales tax law and favoring the retention of the excess-profits tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions and petitions of the members of the Church of the Brethren, of Navarre; the congregation of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, of Bonner Springs; the pastor and sundry members of the Monthly Meeting of Friends, of Haviland; the pastor and congregation of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), of St. Francis; the pastor and congregation of the First Congregational Church of Christ, of Alma; and the pastor and sundry members of the congregation of the Central Congregational Church, of Topeka, all in the State of Kansas, favoring the calling of an international conference for the purpose of considering the reduction of armaments among the nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I received this morning a letter from Carrizozo, N. Mex., bearing upon a general situation, which, to my mind, represents a sentiment that is quite prevalent throughout the country. I ask that the letter may be read, so that it may appear in the RECORD, together with the names of the writers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the communication will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

CARRIZOZO, N. MEX., June 4, 1921.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
Senator from New Mexico, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of Carrizozo, N. Mex., beg leave to inform you that it is our conviction and, we believe, practically the unanimous sentiment of our State that increased military preparation by our United States is both unnecessary and unwise. With the other chief powers sick of war and financially embarrassed we have less need to fear than in the past. And in this day of business depression with taxes distressingly burdensome, our people should not be called upon for huge sums for Army and Navy appropriations.

Especially are we opposed to the citizens' military training camps scheduled for the coming summer. This is the first and surest step toward creating in our beloved land that militaristic spirit which was the curse of Germany and the initial cause of the World War. But yesterday our noble lads gave themselves by the millions and tens of thousands their lives in a "war to prevent war." How shall we avoid the charge of insincerity, and how shall they sleep in their graves if we begin to train on an unprecedented scale their brothers to fight, to say nothing of the cost of the undertaking?

Of course, we can not disarm while other nations maintain armaments. And we believe that the time is opportune for the Government of the United States to call a congress of nations to devise practical and effective means for reducing fighting forces, stores, and equipment, without which step there can be no hope of enduring world peace. And we respectfully urge you as our Senator to use your influence and efforts in this direction.

Sincerely, yours,

Mrs. W. K. MOORE,	Mrs. W. W. STADTMAN,
Mrs. C. A. HOOPER,	A. W. ADAMS,
Mrs. C. A. BARNHART,	S. SPENCE,
Mrs. W. W. MCLEAN,	W. Z. LYONS,
Mrs. E. T. COLLIER,	C. C. HIGBEE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KEYES presented a resolution of the pastor and congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Conway, N. H., favoring the calling of an international conference for the purpose of considering the question of reducing armaments among the nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of the New Hampshire Academy of Science, favoring the proposed plan to establish a forest experiment station in connection with the White Mountain National Forest, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution of Wallingford Grange, No. 33, Patrons of Husbandry, of Wallingford, Conn., protesting against the enactment of legislation to create a daylight saving law, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry members of the Manufacturers' Association, of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, so as to remedy the alleged chaotic conditions in that office, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of San Carlino Republican Club, of New Haven, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation declaring Columbus Day a national holiday, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, favoring the enactment of legislation to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry members of the Manufacturers' Association of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation placing a tariff on crude artificial abrasives, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented two resolutions of Manufacturers' Association of Bridgeport and Torrington Post, No. 38, American Legion, of Torrington, both in the State of Connecticut, favoring the enactment of legislation to provide adequate relief for disabled ex-service men, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented two telegrams, in the nature of memorials, from the Mystic Woolen Mill, of Mystic, and the Fabyan Woolen Co., of Stafford Springs, both in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called truth in fabric bill, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented four letters and a telegram, in the nature of petitions, of the Near East Relief, of East Lyme; W. D. Hood, principal, the Gilbert School, of Winsted; Andrew J. George, secretary, Long Hill Chapel Sunday School, of Middletown; the Staff of Davenport Settlement, of New Haven; and Mary R. Hillard, of Middlebury, all in the State of Connecticut, praying that relief be afforded the suffering peoples of the Near East, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions of the pastor and congregation of the Congregational Church of Kensington; the pastor and congregation of Center Congregational Church of Torrington; the pastor and congregation of Bethany Congregational Church, of Bethany; the pastor and congregation of the Congregational Church of Unionville; the pastor and congregation of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of South Norwalk; the pastor and congregation of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, of Brookfield; the pastor and congregation of Dwight Place Church, of New Haven; the pastor and congregation of the Congregational Church of Naugatuck; the pastor and congregation of the First Universalist Church of Bridgeport; the pastor and congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Winsted; the pastor and congregation of Trinity Episcopal Church, of Waterbury; the pastor and congregation of South Norwalk Baptist Church, of South Norwalk; the pastor and congregation of the Congregational Church of Orange; the League of Women Voters of Stamford; the pastor and congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Bethel; and the pastor and congregation of St. John's parish, of Waterbury, all in the State of Connecticut, favoring the calling of an international conference for the purpose of considering the reduction of armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented resolutions of the congregation of the Methodist Church of Cawker City; the congregation of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, of Wichita; sundry citizens of Erie; the pastor and congregation of the First Presbyterian Church, of Iola; sundry citizens of Cawker City; the pastor and congregation of the Goff Associated Church, of Goff; and the pastor and congregation of the First Baptist Church, of Whiting, all in the State of Kansas, favoring the calling of an international conference for the purpose of considering the question of disarmament among the nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of Wisconsin relating to the restoration of package freight boats on the Great Lakes, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Commerce and printed in the RECORD.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Joint resolution relating to the restoration of package freight boats on the Great Lakes.

Whereas during the World War most of the package freight boats then in service on the Great Lakes were taken therefrom and utilized in war work; and

Whereas it is reported that none of such boats have been restored to service on the Great Lakes; and

Whereas it is conceded that one of the chief causes of business depression is the burdensome freight rates charged by railroads; and

Whereas section 8567 of the Federal Statutes prevents progressive and economic cooperation, regulation, and operation by railroads of commerce on the Great Lakes; and

Whereas it is believed that the restoration of package freight boats to service on the Great Lakes would give to the people of Wisconsin a very large measure of relief from present transportation conditions: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be respectfully memorialized to enact all necessary legislation for the immediate restoration of package freight boats on the Great Lakes and to amend said section 8567 so as to permit all railroads to cooperate in the management, control, and operation of reduction in freight rates and the progress of commercial traffic on the Great Lakes; further

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be and hereby is requested to place a line of package freight boats in service on the Great Lakes so as to give service from the city of Buffalo, N. Y., and the Wisconsin cities of Milwaukee, Superior, Ashland, and Green Bay; and be it further

Resolved, That suitable copies of this resolution, attested by the signatures of the presiding officers and chief clerks of both houses, be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each United States Senator and Congressman from this State, and to the president of said Shipping Board at Washington, D. C.

GEO. H. COMINGS,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
RILEY S. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

REDUCTION OF NAVAL ARMAMENTS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, Thursday morning, June 9. I send it to the desk and ask to have it read. It is very short.

There being no objection, the editorial was read, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger, Thursday morning, June 9, 1921.]

"IT IS OUR MOVE.

"President Harding should, without delay or hesitation, call a conference for halting the building of navies and the creation of armies. Great Britain and Japan should be summoned to the council table.

"The time has come when the three great naval powers—Great Britain, Japan, and America—should sit down and talk over an agreement. Great Britain is ready and Japan will respond. There is no doubt of America's readiness. The world is anxious that such a conference be called and such a move be made. In all of earth's free nations there is a great body of sentiment that would welcome such action on the part of the three great sea powers.

"We are drifting now. We will continue to drift unless some outstanding figure compels the attention of the nations. We are drifting through Yap and Mesopotamia incidents, through recurrent Magdalena Bay and Turtle Bay rumors, through jealousies and prejudices and the stirrings of racial hatreds.

"Steadily the unchecked currents carry us toward misunderstandings and trouble that may flare redly at any time. We drift on toward greater navies, greater burdens on already tax-burdened peoples, as the race for armaments gathers speed and determination.

"We all are drifting as the world drifted before 1914. Great Britain builds super Hoods and seaplanes; Japan is busy with her '8-8 program'; America is trying to appropriate $400,000,000 for the world's supernavy.

"Chemists are playing with gases. Superguns are being evolved. Airplanes are to carry the 'breath of death' over battle fields of the next war. The same old secret, watchful, deadly moves are going on just as they did in the generation before 1914. The thunderheads of the next storm are blue on the horizons.

"We have been told over and over again that the next war means the death of civilization. Yet we go on germinating the seeds of death and no Government raises a hand to check or stay us.

"President Harding is one of the world's commanding figures. If he will call Japan and Great Britain, they will respond. It is his duty and it should be his high privilege to summon the men of Japan and of Britain to grave council.

"The call will be heeded. Should Governments hesitate, the force of public opinion will drive them to the council table. Without faltering or delay President Harding should call a conference on armaments."

REMOVAL OF SOLDIER DEAD FROM FRANCE.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD resolutions recently passed by Post No. 605, Veterans of Foreign Wars. This post is located in Paris. I think it is the only post of American soldiers located in a foreign country. All the members of this post have to do with or are employed in the removal of the bodies of soldiers of the late war that are interred in France. The resolutions and statement annexed seek to rebuke what they describe as malicious allegations and falsehoods that have been spread throughout the country to the effect that this work is not being done with due regard to the sacredness of the undertaking.

I ask that the resolutions and accompanying statement be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

POST NO. 605, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
8 Avenue d'Iene, Paris, France, May 22, 1921.

The ADJUTANT GENERAL,
Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, 32 Union Square, New York City.

DEAR SIR AND COMRADE: The following resolution was passed unanimously at a meeting of this post held Saturday, May 21, 1921, at 27 Boulevard Malesherbes, Paris:

Resolution.

"Whereas the letter written by Owen Wister to the American Legion has been read into the records of the United States Senate, and articles have appeared in the public press of the United States, alleging despoilation and desecration of the remains of our deceased comrades while being exhumed for return to their homeland in accordance with the expressed wishes of next of kin in each case.

"And further alleging that our comrades employed in carrying out this sacred work are individuals who have been recruited from the slums of eastern cities of the United States; who are deserters from their divisions while on their way to the front; who are not qualified for the work they are performing; who have failed to perform this sacred duty in a reverent manner; are leading riotous lives and guilty of gross intoxication: Be it

"Resolved by Post No. 605, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, in meeting assembled, That the said articles are maliciously false; that the insults to these comrades are a direct reflection on Post No. 605, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, many members of which are now employed in this sacred duty; be it further

"Resolved, That the National Encampment, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, be requested to issue a general refutation of these charges to Congress and the American people through the press of the United States;

"That the editors of the New York Times and the Washington Times be requested to retract the articles which appeared in their respective papers; and that Owen Wister be requested to apologize through the public press for his unwarranted, slanderous, and false reflections on the members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

"Be it further resolved, That copies of these resolutions be furnished to the Paris representative of the Associated Press for publication in the United States."

This resolution was passed as a result of articles appearing in the American press during the early part of May, and a letter written by Owen Wister attacking the reputation and character of many of our members who are engaged in the sacred work of exhuming the bodies of our deceased comrades for return to the United States.

These press articles have been forwarded through the mails by the friends and relatives of members of this post and almost without exception the comrades receiving them have been requested to explain the real facts concerning these reports. Many protests in the form of telegrams and letters were received by the post adjutant, demanding that the officers of this post take immediate action, and requesting that the attention of national headquarters be brought to these insults and lies being spread broadcast in America. This resulted in a cablegram being sent you Tuesday, May 17, requesting that the report of the Massachusetts committee to investigate conditions of American cemeteries in France and the work of the American Graves Registration Service be called to the attention of Congress and the American public.

The Massachusetts committee is the only one which has been authorized by the chief of the American Graves Registration Service to inspect every phase of the work being performed by that service, which included actual exhumation of the bodies of our departed comrades.

This committee, upon its return to the United States, rendered a report which spoke highly of the work being performed, and of the personnel performing it. It seems that this has not been taken into consideration by the Senate, but instead certain Senators are calling upon a few disgruntled employees of the Graves Registration Service, who were returned to the United States for discharge as being incompetent in their work, and of such character that the retention of their services was not warranted, to testify. These men were tried in every case before a board of officers upon evidence furnished in most cases by the men working with them and members of this post. None of these discharged employees are members of our post, nor were they ever proposed for membership. Their discharge from the service in which most of us are engaged is a relief to our members, as it will assist in guaranteeing the character of the good work they are performing.

It is realized that every post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars in America is depending upon those engaged in the Graves Registration Service work to see that the sacred remains of their buddies and our buddies receive nothing but the most reverent care and solicitude. We wonder if our brother posts realize, when they receive these remains back in the homeland for burial in their final resting places, that they have been returned by members of Post No. 605? We feel that if they do realize this, they will help us to crush out the malicious lies and insults directed against those members of our post engaged in this work, and that you, the chiefs of our grand organization, will endeavor to make Owen Wister, who is responsible for the greater part of this unjust slander, apologize publicly to the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

It is of record that Owen Wister visited many of our cemeteries in France before any exhumations were made, and also of record that he tried to gain admission to one of the larger American cemeteries while exhumations were in progress but was refused, as have been all others who were not relatives of our deceased comrades. It is known by all members of Post No. 605 that Owen Wister has never visited an American cemetery in France at the time the exhumations were being made. It is also believed by many members of this post who came in contact with him that he questioned them regarding their work with an intent to make malicious use of the information thus gained, and during his tour of the battle fields of France his presence was resented by every member of Post No. 605 with whom he came in contact.

This post has recorded the names of hundreds of prominent citizens of the United States who have visited the American cemeteries in France, many of whom were relatives of our departed comrades and actually witnessed the exhumation of their relatives. If so desired, this post will gladly forward these names to national headquarters for whatever use it may be deemed advisable to make of them.

The work of the Graves Registration Service will continue, as in the past, with reverence and care, for its employees trust and believe that their "buddies" in America and national headquarters of the organization to which they belong will back them and defend them to the limit in performing the sacred duties assigned to them.

Inclosed with this letter is a copy of an article appearing in the New York Herald, Paris edition, of this date, and a copy of the article published in the Washington Times under date of May 1, 1921, which brought about the action we are taking.

Sincerely and fraternally, yours,

(Signed) H. W. DUNNING, Commander.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions and accompanying statement will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 732) to extend the provisions of section 2455, Revised Statutes, to the lands within the abandoned Fort Buford Military Reservation, in the States of North Dakota and Montana, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 104) thereon.

Mr. KENDRICK, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 1590) to add certain lands to the Wyoming National Forest, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 105) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 491) to provide, without expenditure of Federal funds, the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment to the title and submitted a report (No. 106) thereon.

SULPHUR RIVER BRIDGE, TEX.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1970) granting the consent of Congress to the counties of Bowie and Cass, State of Texas, for construction of a bridge across Sulphur River, at or near Pettis Bridge on State Highway No. 8, in said counties and State, and I submit a report (No. 103) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the counties of Bowie and Cass, State of Texas, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Sulphur River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the location of Pettis Bridge on Texas State Highway No. 8, as located between Douglassville, in Cass County, and the town of Maud, in Bowie County, State of Texas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Also from the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1934) granting the consent of Congress to the Huntington & Ohio Bridge Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a highway and street railway toll bridge across the Ohio River between the city of Huntington, W. Va., and a point opposite in the State of Ohio, and I submit a report (No. 102) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Huntington & Ohio Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a highway and street railway toll bridge and approaches thereto across the Ohio River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, one end of said bridge being in the city of Huntington, W. Va., and the other end at a point opposite said city of Huntington, in the State of Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 2021) granting a pension to Dellie M. Wayne (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2022) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 2023) defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

RELIEF OF FLOOD SUFFERERS IN COLORADO.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, Senators will recall that on the evening of June 7 the Senate passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 69) for the relief of sufferers in Colorado from the flood due to the overflow of the Arkansas River and its tributaries. At the same time the House passed an identical joint resolution (H. J. Res. 148), which was transmitted to the Senate and passed by the Senate on the morning of June 8. The Senate joint resolution should be indefinitely postponed. It is at the Secretary's desk, and I move to reconsider the votes by which it was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that Senate joint resolution No. 69 be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

SHIPPERS' CLAIMS AGAINST RAILROADS.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I am compelled to leave the city at 1 o'clock this afternoon, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 621. If there shall be any debate on it or any delay in its consideration, I shall withdraw the request. I do not think, however, there will be any objection to the bill.

I will state the purpose of the bill. When the railroad act was passed and the railroads were turned back to private ownership the law provided that any claims by shippers growing out of unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory rates, or rates which were otherwise in violation of law, were to be presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission within one year from the passage of the act. That would be one year from the 1st of March, 1920. Freight shippers who had been overcharged—that is, charged more than the legal tariff rates—through mistake or in some other way, did not understand that claims for overcharges came within the meaning of the statute, and they presented such claims directly to the Director General of Railroads to have them settled, as Congress had authorized they should be settled, by the agent of the Federal Government, the director general.

The director general, however, ruled that the claims must be presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it being too late to so present them, he transmitted all the claims which had come to him to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the shippers were left in the lurch. Since that time, it is fair to say, the director general is considering such claims, but it still remains a question of doubt whether they must not be presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission within the year.

The bill simply provides an additional extension of a year to shippers as to claims in respect to overcharges on the tariffs. That is all there is of the bill. The Interstate Commerce Commission and the Director General of Railroads have recommended the bill, and all the shippers' associations have asked that it be passed. The Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate have reported the bill; it is on the calendar, and I should like to have it passed this morning. I think it is quite important that it should be passed, in order to protect the shippers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 621) to amend section 206 (c) of an act entitled "An act to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1920, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That," to strike out "section 206" and to insert "subdivision"; in the same line, after the word "of," to strike out "an act entitled 'An act to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes,' approved February 28," and to insert "section 206 of the transportation act"; and on page 2, line 4, after the word "amended," to insert "to read," so as to read:

That subdivision (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920, be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 14, before the words "be filed," to strike out "shall" and insert "may," so as to read:

SEC. 206. (c) Complaints praying for reparation on account of damage claimed to have been caused by reason of the collection or enforcement by or through the President during the period of Federal control of rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices (including those applicable to interstate, foreign, or intrastate traffic) which were unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly or unreasonably prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of the interstate commerce act, may be filed with the commission.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota why that amendment is proposed by the committee?

Mr. KELLOGG. I presume it is proposed for this reason: The shippers are presenting their claims to the director general; he is authorized to settle them in the first instance, and he is settling them now. I do not know why the commission suggested the change of the word "shall" to "may," but I see no objection to that being done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As proposed to be amended the bill would give them the privilege of presenting their claims within a year, while as the bill was originally drawn it requires them to present them within a year.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And it seems to me they should be required to present them within the year; that there should be a time limit absolutely fixed within which they must present their claims. Otherwise such claims would be stringing along indefinitely.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to the word being changed from "may" to "shall."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. At first glance I had the same idea in mind as expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], but on a little more thought it seems to me that the word "may" is really more in the interest of the Government than the word "shall," because as it is now, if the time has expired, the shippers have no right to file their claims. The word "may" is simply permissive, that they "may" file their claims if they do so within a year. It is not mandatory upon them to do so. If a man does not want to file a claim he should not be compelled to file it. It seems to me that the word "may" is the better word, for, as I have said, it simply permits shippers within a year to file their claims, if they wish to do so. I am not satisfied that in effect there would be any difference at all, no matter which word shall be used, and really I do not intend to insist upon one or the other, but it struck me that the word "may" was better adapted to accomplish the purpose and to permit shippers to file their claims within a year.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], if he thinks it is better than the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. A number of Senators have bills on the calendar which we are very anxious to have considered and passed at the earliest moment; and I desire to ask, Has unanimous consent been granted for the present consideration of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent has been granted for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope that we may have a call of the calendar regularly, because, I repeat, a number of us are interested in some very important bills, which ought to be considered in their regular order. May I ask, Mr. President, whether in the morning hour speeches are limited to five minutes? I hope so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks they are not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am unable to find from the letter of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Clark, which is printed in the report of the committee on the pending bill, that the commission recommends that this amendment to the bill be made.

It seems that the existing law requires all claims to be filed within one year; it fixes one year absolutely as the limit within which they shall be filed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that the amendment should be disagreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. In that event, the word "shall" will remain in the bill instead of the word "may."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 15, after the word "within," it is proposed to insert "one year, or, if so claimed in respect of overcharges above the legal tariff charge, within," so as to read:

SEC. 206 (c) Complaints praying for reparation on account of damage claimed to have been caused by reason of the collection or enforcement by or through the President during the period of Federal control of rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices (including those applicable to interstate, foreign, or intrastate traffic) which were unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly or unreasonably prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of the interstate commerce act, shall be filed with the commission, within one year, or, if so claimed in respect of overcharges above the legal tariff charge, within two years after the termination of Federal control, against the agent designated by the President under subdivision (a).

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Interstate Commerce Commission in a subsequent letter have called my attention to the fact that the heading "Causes of action arising out of Federal control," are already in the law and should not be reenacted in the amendment, and, therefore, the words "Causes of action arising out of Federal control," in the heading, and the next words, "Sec. 206," ought to be eliminated in order to prevent a repetition. I move, accordingly, that the words "Causes of action arising out of Federal control. Sec. 206," be eliminated. The words occur on page 2, lines 5 and 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the heading "Causes of action arising out of Federal control"; and, at the beginning of line 6, to strike out "Sec. 206."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend subdivision (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before passing from the measure just under consideration I desire to say that the bill was introduced by me. There may be some question whether it is full enough to cover all claims for damages, but, in view of the construction now placed upon the act and in view of the practice of the Interstate Commerce Commission up to this time, I am inclined to think that the bill, as amended by the committee and as recommended by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, will take care of proper claims that ought to be presented and allowed. Therefore I am agreeable to the amendments, and I believe that under the bill all proper claims may be presented within the period allowed by the bill.

UNLAWFUL CONVEYANCE OF GOODS OR COMMODITIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. DIAL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1804.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to object; but so many Senators on this side have urged me to see that we have a calendar call that I fear this may take up the time and we will not get the calendar up. The morning hour will close at 2 o'clock.

Mr. DIAL. I do not think this bill will create any debate.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I withdraw my suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1804) to protect the interest of innocent third persons in property which is used in the unlawful conveyance of goods or commodities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the bill read first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The reading clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], who reported the bill from the Judiciary Committee, to tell us succinctly just what the changes in the law are.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, this bill amends a law which was enacted, I think, in 1866. As applied now, the existing law would forfeit an automobile which happened to carry prohibited articles—liquor, to be perfectly frank—even though the automobile had been stolen from the owner and even though the fact that it was stolen as of the time was unknown to him. In other words, it protects the property of innocent persons, which property is used without their knowledge, consent, or connivance in any wise.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, under the law of 1866, if a chauffeur should secure a case of liquor or a bottle of liquor and convey it in an automobile without the knowledge of the owner of the automobile, the owner of the automobile would have to suffer the loss of his automobile?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely; and the court has so held in a recent decision by our Supreme Court, which was attached to, I think, and made a part of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. It might be further added that the question of knowledge or connivance under the old law was treated as an entirely immaterial factor.

Mr. SMOOT. This bill amends the law of 1866 in what respect?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It permits the owner to intervene and set up and prove, if he can, his title and that the instrumentality was used without his knowledge or consent. In other words, it permits an innocent person whose property has been thus used to reclaim his property and not suffer its forfeiture under the old law of 1866.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the report itself, on page 2, states that the amendment to the existing law consists in the following words added at the end of the first sentence:

but no proceeding under this section for the forfeiture of any vessel, boat, cart, carriage, or other conveyance, or horses or other animals shall destroy the interest in any property of any person who intervenes in any forfeiture proceeding, who had no knowledge or reasonable grounds for knowing of the use or intended use of such property for conveying such goods or commodities.

This amendment, as the Senator from California has stated, was made necessary by a decision of the Supreme Court which is quoted in the report, being the case of J. W. Goldsmith, jr.—Grant Co. against the United States; and in that decision the court stated, as the report says:

The court admits that such interpretation "seems to violate that justice which should be the foundation of the due process of law required by the Constitution," but that "it is too firmly fixed in the punitive and remedial jurisprudence of the country to be now displaced."

The object of this amendment is to change the law so that if a person owns an undivided interest in an automobile, for instance, and it is stolen and used for an illegal purpose, his innocent undivided interest shall not be forfeited, but only that of the wrongdoer. The committee, I think, was unanimous in favor of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the bill ought to pass. I simply wanted to know why it was proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1804) to protect the interests of innocent third persons in property which is used in the unlawful conveyance of goods or commodities, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 3450 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3450. Whenever any goods or commodities for or in respect whereof any tax is or shall be imposed, or any materials, utensils, or vessels proper or intended to be made use of for or in the making of such goods or commodities are removed, or are deposited or concealed in any place, with intent to defraud the United States of such tax, or any part thereof, all such goods and commodities, and all such materials, utensils, and vessels, respectively, shall be forfeited; and in every such case all the casks, vessels, cases, or other packages whatsoever, containing, or which shall have contained, such goods or commodities, respectively, and every vessel, boat, cart, carriage, or other conveyance whatsoever, and all horses or other animals, and all things used in the removal or for the deposit or concealment thereof, respectively, shall be forfeited; but no proceeding under this section for the forfeiture of any vessel, boat, cart, carriage, or other conveyance, or horses or other animals, shall destroy the interest in any property of any person who intervenes in any forfeiture proceeding, who had no knowledge or reasonable grounds for knowing of the use or intended use of such property for conveying such goods or commodities. And every person who removes, deposits, or conceals, or is concerned in removing, depositing, or concealing any goods or commodities for or in respect whereof any tax is or shall be imposed with intent to defraud the United States of such tax or any part thereof shall be liable to a fine or penalty of not more than $500. And all boilers, stills, or other vessels, tools, and implements used in distilling or rectifying and forfeited under any of the provisions of this title and all condemned material, together with any engine or other machinery connected therewith, and all empty barrels and all grain or other material suitable for distillation, shall, under the direction of the court in which the forfeiture is recovered, be sold at public auction, and the proceeds thereof, after deducting the expenses of sale, shall be disposed of according to law. And all spirits or spirituous liquors which may be forfeited under the provisions of this title, unless herein otherwise provided, shall be disposed of by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HARRISON addressed the Senate. After having spoken for a few minutes,

Mr. DIAL. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield, that the bill which has been under consideration may be put on its passage?

Mr. HARRISON. Very well; I yield for that purpose.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to protect the interest of innocent persons in property which is used in the unlawful conveyance of goods or commodities."

Mr. HARRISON resumed and concluded his speech, which appears entire below.

ADMIRAL SIMS'S STATEMENT AND AMBASSADOR HARVEY'S ADDRESS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered a resolution, which was passed by the Senate, directing the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate to investigate the alleged utterances of Admiral William S. Sims in London on Tuesday night. I hope that committee will procure from the Secretary of the Navy, who has requested it, an explanation of that speech at the very earliest moment possible.

If the utterances of Admiral Sims, as reported in the papers are admitted to be correct, I hope, in the event the Secretary of the Navy fails to take appropriate action, that the Congress will. Of course, we must rely upon the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate to make their recommendations after a full and thorough investigation. I am sure that committee will take the resolution up for immediate consideration.

I understand from a dispatch from London that to-day Admiral Sims said that he was expressing what was in his heart, and that he had nothing to take back. Not content with his outrageous action on Tuesday night, he now utters defiance at those who seek to rebuke him. I will read the dispatch from London, which came over the International News Service wires to-day:

LONDON, June 10.

Rear Admiral William S. Sims, United States Navy, to-day defied the American Navy Department "to muzzle" him. The admiral who has been called upon by Secretary of the Navy Denby at Washington to explain his sensational "jackass" speech on Tuesday made another public address at a luncheon this afternoon, at which he announced that he intends to keep on saying what he thinks.

Admiral Sims was the guest of the American Luncheon Club. Wilson Gross, who introduced the outspoken American naval officer, referred to him in these words:

"Every honest-thinking, true, full-blooded American will stand by what Admiral Sims said on Tuesday."

Mr. BORAH. Who was that last quotation from?

Mr. HARRISON. That was from Mr. Wilson Cross, who introduced the admiral as an outspoken American naval officer, and referred to him in these words:

Every honest-thinking, true-blooded American will stand by what Admiral Sims said on Tuesday.

This dispatch continues:

The cheers which greeted the admiral lasted for a minute and a half.

"I have attempted upon all occasions to say what I wanted to say," declared Admiral Sims, in addressing the gathering. "I have always told the truth as I understood it. I am afraid I told what I believe to be the truth the other day.

"What I said the other day is practically the same as has been said repeatedly upon American platforms.

"I intend to keep on doing the same thing. If that is un-American, let them make the best of it."

Mr. President, it seems that the Secretary of the Navy is doing all that he can to obtain an early reply from Admiral Sims, and, unofficially, I presume, this dispatch has gone over the wire. What Admiral Sims said was not only very indiscreet but it was most reprehensible for an officer standing so high to give utterance to such sentiments.

But recently another very distinguished appointee, occupying a very high place, made a speech at a banquet in London in which he not only insulted a part of the American citizens but he insulted all true, red-blooded American citizens.

I speak of the speech of Ambassador George Harvey, delivered at the Pilgrims' dinner recently in London. I shall not burden the Senate by recalling what he said at that time, but I shall just read a part of it, for the purpose of keeping fresh in the minds of the Senate what was really said. Said Ambassador Harvey:

Even to this day at rare intervals an ebullient sophomore seeks applause and wins a smile by shouting that "We won the war!" Far more prevalent until recently was the impression—and this was and still is in a measure sincere—that we went into the war to rescue humanity from all kinds of menacing perils.

Not a few remain convinced that we sent our young soldiers across the sea to save this Kingdom and France and Italy. This is not the fact. We sent them solely to save the United States of America, and most reluctantly and laggardly at that.

We were not too proud to fight—whatever that may mean. We were afraid not to fight. That is the real truth of the matter, and so we came along toward the end and helped you and your allies to shorten the war. That is all we did and all we claim to have done.

Mr. President, that utterance was made by the distinguished ambassador to the Court of St. James on May 19. This speech of Admiral Sims was made Tuesday night. Both are representatives of the present administration. Within less than 24 hours the Secretary of the Navy took cognizance of the Sims speech, asking him by cable whether the speech had been correctly reported in the papers. But in the other instance no official of this Government has raised his voice in protest. So far as we can judge from the papers he has not been called down, so to speak, by the President of the United States, by the Secretary of State, or by anyone else high in the administration.

There is a very splendid editorial in this morning's New York World which very truly expresses what is in the minds of the people of America to-day touching these "Gold Dust Twins" who now represent the Government of the United States in England. This editorial in the World is headed: "Sims and Harvey." I shall not read it all, but just passages from it. The editorial says:

The hysterical excitement of the Harding administration over the indiscretions of Rear Admiral Sims's London speech is in striking contrast with its cynical indifference to the far more glaring indiscretions of Ambassador Harvey's London speech.

When Mr. Harvey insulted all the American people in the name of the President there was not a word of official disapproval. Not a Republican Senator made a protest. No hint of disavowal came from the White House or the State Department. On the contrary, the correspondents were told in effect that the Harvey speech was wholly acceptable to the administration.

I do not know whether it was or not. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the leader on the other side, who now hears me, has not said so, nor has the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, said so. We are left in a quandary—in doubt—as to whether the ambassador was really expressing the real views of the administration in his speech of May 19.

This editorial says further:

Yet the Sims speech, however much it may be open to criticism on the ground of fact and good taste, is merely the opinion of an individual. Nobody would dream of interpreting it as an expression of the United States Government's policy or opinion. The Harvey speech, on the other hand, has been accepted everywhere in Europe as the formal expression of President Harding's own views on international affairs.

* * * * * * *

It was all right, so far as the administration was concerned, for Mr. Harvey to describe the American people as a set of poltroons who went to war only because "they were afraid not to fight," but all wrong for Rear Admiral Sims to assail the Sinn Feiners who are engaged in making Irish politics an American issue.

* * * * * * *

That may or may not be the case; but it is plain enough from the developments at Washington that Sims's mistake was in assailing a small faction of American voters. Had he taken the precaution to insult all the American people as Harvey did, had he dragged their ideals and their idealisms into the mud and pictured them as a Nation of war profiteers intent only on defending their swag, he might have counted on the same measure of administration consideration that has been accorded to George Harvey.

Mr. President, there never was a grosser insult offered to the American people, and to the boys who fought and sacrificed and won this war, than those embodied in the speech which the ambassador to the Court of St. James delivered on May 19 at London. They are very different from the views expressed by Mr. Harvey in 1917 as to the purposes of the United States in entering the war. I can not understand the operations of mind of a man who can change on so many questions so quickly as this very distinguished representative of the American Government at London. In 1917 he was loud in his praise of the very admirable speech delivered by President Wilson in his message to Congress setting forth the reasons why we should at last go to war against the German Government.

I read, so that the RECORD will show, how this man has changed his mind again. I do not know whether he was sincere when he made his London speech, and whether he was expressing his true views then and there as to whether or not we just went into the war to save our own skins; or whether he was sincere in his expressions in April and May, 1917, when he spoke as the editor of the North American Review.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is it about Admiral Sims or Col. Harvey the Senator is now speaking?

Mr. HARRISON. This is about the other "Gold Dust Twin." I was just speaking about Sims awhile ago, now of Harvey, one of whom the distinguished Senator from Illinois saw fit, when he read his utterances over in London, to condemn with all the vehemence and eloquence with which he is gifted. I have never heard the Senator open his mouth in criticism of the other, even though the speech of Col. Harvey made in London was much more reprehensible and more insulting to more people of this country than the one made by Admiral Sims.

But the thing that gave the words of the distinguished Senator from Illinois so much greater weight than if they had been uttered by any other Senator on the other side of the aisle was the fact that he sat on a subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee some months ago, when a controversy arose between the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, and Admiral Sims over the question of awarding medals. The distinguished Senator from Illinois heard all the evidence. He was friendly to Admiral Sims.

He sided with him in that controversy; and it shows the bigness of the Senator, it shows that he was correct in what he said, when he gave the expression yesterday to the country that the remarks of Admiral Sims at London were outrageous and an insult to the American people, and when he showed his interest and indignation by going to the Secretary of the Navy and saying to him, "Mr. Secretary, it will not do for the Republican administration to countenance such statements as those being made by the man who stands the highest in the American Navy, and who is now in England making speeches like this," and advising the Secretary of the Navy to send that message to Admiral Sims. Due to his influence, I believe, more than to anything or anyone else, did Secretary of the Navy Denby send the message to Admiral Sims asking for a full account of the speech and the correctness of the reports of what he said.

So I wish that the distinguished Senator from Illinois would display the same energy and power of his influence in trying to persuade his friend the Secretary of State or his other friend, with whom he has great influence, President Harding, to wire to George Harvey, the ambassador at London, and ask him what he meant when he said in his recent outrageous speech that we were fighting to save our own skins.

I hope that the Senator from Illinois will think about that proposition and deliberate on it, and see if he can not get President Harding yet, even at this late date, to cable to his friend Col. George Harvey, at London, and ask him to retract what he said on that subject.

I was going to read, before I was diverted, what Col. George Harvey said in May, 1917, touching the message which President Wilson delivered to Congress. This is headed "The Call to Arms," and was contained in the North American Review for May, 1917. He referred in this to President Wilson's "Call to arms," speaking of his message of April 2, 1917, as—

> The great declaration of Woodrow Wilson, which will live in history as no less striking in substance and in form than that of Thomas Jefferson and quite as far-reaching in consequences to humankind as the pronouncement to King John of the barons of England. That is much to say, but not too much.

Here are some of the passages that were contained in that message of President Wilson, delivered to Congress on April 2, 1917:

> American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. * * * Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the Nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.
> While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world, what our motives and our objects are.

Those motives, George Harvey, in the editorial to which I have referred, at that time pronounced as equal to the pronouncement to King John of the barons of England or of Thomas Jefferson's great utterances.

I quote further from President Wilson's message:

> Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-government peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles.
> We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them. * * *
> It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts, for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

Mr. President, those are some of the excerpts from the historic message of President Wilson to Congress on April 2, of the year 1917, and the very next day the now ambassador to the high Court of St. James telegraphed to the President of the United States expressing his warm approval of that remarkable message. Here is what the telegram said from the man whom I quoted as recently saying that we did not go to war to help France or England or any other country or humanity but merely to save our own skins. Here is the kind of message he sent. I am sure this is pleasing to the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]:

> A great message of patriotism—
> Said Harvey—
> evidencing masterful leadership based upon mutual faith of the President in his country and of the country in its President. I was confident as one could be, but, even so, I was not prepared for so splendid a realization. For the Nation it is glorious, for patriots inspiring, for the President noble.

For fear that the Senator from Utah did not catch that, I desire to read it again. Can one imagine that Harvey, the man who spoke as he did on the night of May 19 in London, assailing that for which our boys sacrificed and fought, an insult to all America, should have said that and then penned such a remarkable message to President Wilson following the next day after his address to Congress? I read again:

> A great message of patriotism, evidencing masterful leadership based upon mutual faith of the President in his country and of the country in its President. I was confident as one could be, but, even so, I was not prepared for so splendid a realization. For the Nation—
> Said Harvey—
> it is glorious, for patriots inspiring, for the President noble.

Those were the words in the telegram that Harvey sent to President Wilson on the day following the delivery of that great message stating the object for which our boys went to war.

In the article of May, 1917, Col. George Harvey said further:

> The great declaration of Woodrow Wilson, which will live in history as no less striking in form than that of Thomas Jefferson and quite as far-reaching in consequence to humankind as the pronouncement to King John of the barons of England. That is much to say, but not too much.
> We ask our readers—
> Col. Harvey continues—
> to note the "gentle guiding" of public sentiment into the channel of righteousness and the gradual building up in the common consciousness of a conviction that there was no escape from the performance of a duty essential to the life, liberty, and happiness of all mankind.
> Not side by side—
> Said the colonel—
> but as a natural and logical sequence of the Declaration of Independence and the Emancipation Proclamation stands the great message of that which we heralded last month as patriotism and now proclaim as democracy * * *
> As we enter upon and proceed with the mighty task confronting us we shall do well to keep constantly before our minds these words of justification and inspiration.

Then follows the last part of Wilson's war declaration address, with the following sentences among others:

> We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy—

He placed those words, "the world must be safe for democracy," in italics, so that everyone, whether they have bad eyes or not, could see them. Then he said:

> We fought one great war to make sure that government of the people, by the people, for the people should not perish from the earth. It will be worth while to fight another, and a greater, to cause government of the people, by the people, for the people to prevail throughout the world.

Yet, in view of these utterances and expressions of George Harvey in May, 1917, with reference to our entry into the war and the causes for which we entered the war, he makes the speech of May 19, 1921, at the Pilgrims' luncheon in London, where he insults every American soldier and all the American people who so proudly sacrificed in that great struggle for right and humanity by saying that we were fighting merely to save our own hides, so to speak.

It seems to me that this administration—I care not whether it is President Harding, Secretary of State Hughes, or any Member of the Senate on the other side of the aisle, because I know there is not a Member over there or anyone else connected with the administration who can possibly agree with Col. Harvey in those utterances—should force Harvey's hand, like Secretary of the Navy Denby is forcing Sims's hand. It ought to be called.

They ought to get rid, if it is possible to get rid, of this man Sims. If the statements attributed to Admiral Sims are admitted to be correct, the Navy should be rid of him. He should not occupy the high place in the Navy that he does, going over the world making such indiscreet and uncalled-for attacks upon the citizenship of America. And certainly the other fellow, who holds a higher place than Admiral Sims and has a strong hold on the affections of the Republican leadership and those who are in the highest councils of the party, should be recalled, and recalled quickly.

I have not said anything about this matter since Col. Harvey made his speech. I fought his confirmation because I thought he would do that which he has done. Those of us who voted against him felt he was an improper person—absolutely unfit—to represent this Government in so important a diplomatic post. We were afraid that he would bring disgrace upon the Government that he represents. But after he made it I remained silent in the hope that the Secretary of State—great, able, true American that he is—would do as Secretary of the Navy Denby has done in the Sims case, and ask him if it were true that he had made such an utterance in such a speech as the papers reported, and if he said that he did, then to tell him that he does not truly represent the spirit of America and recall him. He should be, because if he remains there he will continue to make blunders, and not only will the Republican Party regret it, but it will be to the everlasting disgrace of our country.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar is in order, and the Secretary will report the first bill on the calendar.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent that we commence with the calendar at the particular point where we left off the last time the calendar was before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with Calendar No. 78, bills to be considered to which there is no objection.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I was proceeding to ask unanimous consent for something similar to that request. What did the Senator ask?

Mr. SMOOT. To begin with Calendar No. 78.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the point where we left off?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; that is what I was asking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the call of the calendar begin with Calendar No. 78. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will state No. 78.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (S. 904) fixing the term of service of Elijah C. Putnam during the Civil War.

Mr. KING. Is that a bill for the restoration of rights to a deserter?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a case where 90 days' service was not rendered by the soldier, but he was in the Army for some time before he was regularly mustered into it. I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 831) to amend the proviso in paragraph 10 of section 9 of the Federal reserve act amended by the act of June 21, 1917, amending the Federal reserve act, was announced as next in order.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 387) granting certain public lands to the city of Phoenix, Ariz., for municipal purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that is a bill which was introduced by myself. A similar bill has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate. I therefore ask that the bill which has just been announced as next in order on the calendar may be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SWAN LAND & CATTLE CO.

The bill (S. 488) providing for an exchange of lands between the Swan Land & Cattle Co. and the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that upon proper execution and delivery by the Swan Land & Cattle Co. (Ltd.), a corporation, of a deed conveying to the United States, its successors and assigns, a good merchantable title in fee, free of encumbrance, to certain lands needed by the United States for construction, operation, and maintenance purposes, in connection with the North Platte irrigation project, Nebraska-Wyoming, to wit: The southwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 25, township 25 north, range 63 west, sixth principal meridian, Wyoming; then in exchange for such lands so conveyed a patent shall be issued by the United States to said Swan Land & Cattle Co., its successors and assigns, conveying to the company the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 26 and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 23, township 25 north, range 63 west, sixth principal meridian.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN WALTERS, OKLA.

The bill (S. 530) to quiet title to certain tracts of land in the city of Walters, State of Oklahoma, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to release and quitclaim unto the city of Walters, Okla., whatsoever right, title, or interest the United States may have by reason of escheat or otherwise in and to any of the public reserves shown upon the plat of the town site of Walters, State of Oklahoma, prepared under the direction of Warren H. Brown, probate judge of Comanche County, Okla., and any public reserves designated in the patent of such reserves issued by the Government to that town.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES IN RIVERSIDE COUNTY, CALIF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5223) to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in Riverside County, Calif.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no desert-land entry heretofore made in good faith under the public land laws for lands in townships 4 and 5 south, range 15 east; townships 4 and 5 south, range 16 east; townships 4, 5, and 6 south, range 17 east; townships 5, 6, and 7 south, range 18 east; townships 6 and 7 south, range 19 east; townships 6 and 7 south, range 20 east; townships 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 south, range 21 east; townships 5, 6, and sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 18, and 19, in township 7 south, range 22 east; township 5 south, range 23 east, San Bernardino meridian, in Riverside County, State of California, shall be canceled prior to May 1, 1923, because of failure on the part of the entrymen to make any annual or final proof falling due upon any such entry prior to said date. The requirements of law as to annual assessments and final proof shall become operative from said date as though no suspension had been made. If the said entrymen are unable to procure water to irrigate the said lands above described through no fault of theirs, after using due diligence, or the legal questions as to their right to divert or impound water for the irrigation of said lands are still pending and undetermined by said May 1, 1923, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to grant a further extension for an additional period of not exceeding two years.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of my colleague, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, as to the purpose of this bill, which relates to certain lands in California? I have had no opportunity to read the report, but the bill on its face seems to change the method of obtaining title to desert land.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Interior in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives, which is embodied in the report of the Senate committee on the bill, after citing the statutes affecting this land, states:

However, in view of the fact that investigations relative to development of the power and irrigation possibilities of the Colorado River have not been completed, of the fact that these lands are probably worthless unless it should be found that it is possible to reclaim them through irrigation, and as no other substantial use can apparently be made of the lands in their present condition, I see no particular objection to the extension proposed in the bill.

I will say to the Senator from Utah that the lands in question, just as the Secretary says, are of no particular value, and if they can be used for the purpose provided in the bill, I am quite sure the Senator from Utah will not object.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

The bill (S. 1288) to provide for the appointment of one additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint one additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, who shall reside in said district and who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same compensation as the present district judges of said district.

Mr. KING. I should like some explanation in regard to this measure.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I did not report the bill, but I was present when it was considered in the Judiciary Committee. The Attorney General of the United States sent a letter to the committee in regard to the bill, recommending the appointment of two additional judges instead of one, and explaining the importance of having more judges in the State of New York. The committee took the matter under consideration, and in view of the amount of business before the court in the district referred to, concluded that some help should be furnished; but instead of allowing two judges, as recommended by the Attorney General, we reported in favor of the appointment of one additional judge. The Attorney General states that there is a great accumulation of business in that district; that the judges are very far behind in its transaction; and that there should be additional judges in order to carry on the business of the court, especially because of the number of blockade cases.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether the business in the district is in arrears?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; it is very much so.

Mr. KING. I suppose that grows out of the execution of the Volstead Act and other recent penal Federal laws.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is undoubtedly due in considerable degree to that.

Mr. KING. Some of which cover matters and enter fields properly cognizable by the States. Many Federal statutes are being enacted dealing with misdemeanors and small matters which the States in the exercise of their undoubted powers should and do deal with.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Attorney General stated that there were many cases which the present judges were unable to try.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that this is a kind of a pilot bill, to be followed up by various bills indefinitely increasing the number of life-term United States judges. On the way to the committee of which he is a member, if not already before the committee, is a bill to do the same thing for the State of Georgia. The dockets of the courts are being loaded up with misdemeanor cases that have no proper place at all before men of such eminent qualifications as those who should preside and who generally do preside over United States courts. In my judgment it would be better if the powers of United States commissioners were enlarged and they were authorized to hold hearings and themselves to try such cases, and thus relieve the docket.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator's idea is that United States commissioners ought to try cases of misdemeanor?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I think that such an officer might well discharge some of the functions imposed upon a county court judge or a city judge.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, representatives of the Bar Association of the United States, as I understand, recently met in this city, and during the evening this question of additional judges was discussed, and also the matter of relieving the congestion existing in some of the judicial districts. At that meeting there were representatives from every State. Reference was made to the thousands of misdemeanor cases that were before the Federal judges growing out of the narcotic law, the Volstead Act, and other penal statutes. I think it was the view of some who were present that some of the work now being performed by the Federal judges of the character described by the Senator from Georgia might with propriety be delegated to some other tribunal or instrumentality to be created by law. It was suggested that a commissioner might be appointed who would have certain judicial powers and be authorized to deal with many of the minor matters and misdemeanors which now occupy the time of the judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. The contention has been made that we should provide a lot of little judges in every State in the Union to try these special cases. To that I am utterly opposed. If we are going to appoint judges, let us have judges who can try all character of cases.

Mr. KING. The Senator may be right, but there is much in what the Senator from Georgia has said. I express no opinion as to what should be done to meet the conditions, which undoubtedly call for some action by Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree that if we have the constitutional power to confer on the United States commissioners the power to try small cases, such as misdemeanors, that might be advisable, and I might not object to that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. KING. I am going to object to the present consideration of the bill, I will say to the Senator, only because I feel that the situation is such that some general legislation is needed, and the question should not be attacked in a piecemeal way.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will say that the two judges now presiding in the State of Georgia——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection of the Senator from Utah the bill will go over.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I ask the Senator from North Carolina to yield to me; and if I may have the consent of the Senate, I desire to say a few words further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The two judges now presiding over the two United States district courts in the State of Georgia are personal friends of mine; I practiced law with them. The judge of the northern district is perhaps the best lawyer in the State of Georgia, especially on the civil side of the court. The judge of the southern district was a judge of the supreme court of the State of Georgia and was considered the best judge on that bench; as an all-around laywer he has no superior in the South, in my judgment. It seems somewhat a waste of talent, knowledge, and of dignity for these two eminent lawyers to be trying little misdemeanor cases, where there is nothing in the world involved but a question of fact, and hardly ever a question of law. They might very well be relieved by providing that such questions of fact shall be tried by some lower tribunal and a jury drawn when demand for a jury trial is made.

It is not desired indefinitely to increase the number of life-term offices. The Members of the Senate do not hold life terms; the President does not hold a life term; it is phenomenal in our system that anybody should hold a life term; and it is not desired anywhere, so far as I can learn, that there should be an indefinite increase in the number of life-term judges. Therefore, I suggest to my friend from North Carolina that the passage of the pending bill will set a precedent which will be followed in State after State until we shall have an unlimited number of life-term judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is a great deal in what the Senator has said, but in the Senate during the present session we have passed three or four bills providing for the appointment of additional United States judges. There was one such judge provided for in the State of Montana, as well as in two or three other States. I did not report this bill and I am not in charge of it, but I am just giving the facts which appeared before the committee. The Attorney General says it is impossible for the judges in the district of New York to transact the business which comes before them in great volume; it has accumulated so that they can not get along at all. He asked that provision be made for the appointment of two additional judges, but the committee has recommended only one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, is there an insistence that this bill go over?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I feel that it should go over at this time. Of course, there must be some action taken soon, and if the Judiciary Committee does not take the matter up immediately, I shall not oppose the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has asked that the bill go over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to make a statement in connection with it at this time. Will the Senator withdraw his objection for just a moment?

Mr. KING. I will withdraw it for the purpose of allowing the Senator to make his statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to put some things in the RECORD, if the Senator will allow me to do so.

Mr. President, the Attorney General has had a special investigation made of the condition of the calendars of the Federal courts in the southern district of New York. The report of the committee which reported this bill contains the report of this investigation. It portrays a desperate state of affairs. There can be no question whatsoever that the business of the Federal district courts in the southern district of New York is falling hopelessly behind. The Attorney General asks and urges that two additional district judges be assigned to that district, and I am prepared to prove to the Senate that that will save money to the Treasury of the United States.

The situation to-day in the southern district is such that constantly Federal district judges from other districts are brought in to try to help out the judges who belong in the district. When the other judges from outside are brought there they not only continue to draw their salaries of $7,500 per year but they are paid $10 a day in addition. I have here a list of the district judges who have been brought into that district to assist in the work and the amounts of money paid to them during a two-year period, from October 1, 1918, to September 30, 1920. I shall not recite them all. There are about 20 or 25 of these outside judges who were brought in at one time or another.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KING. That is very enlightening, and I shall be glad to have it in the RECORD; but I will say to the Senator that I shall feel constrained to object to the passage of the bill at this time.

A committee of able lawyers, one of whom is former Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia, is now considering the question of providing additional judges or some suitable plan of meeting the congested conditions found in some of the Federal courts. This committee is seeking the appointment of a joint committee from the Senate and the House which will cooperate with this committee. It is hoped that this question and others relating to procedure, as well as substantive law, will be comprehensively dealt with by these committees of Congress and the bar association. If no action is taken and no plan proposed to meet this situation of which the Senator complains, I shall withdraw objection to the consideration of this bill; but, in view of the fact that this matter is receiving attention, and other districts will soon be under other judges appointed, if some plan is not provided to relieve the congestion in many of the United States courts, I feel that it is proper to wait for a short time before acting on the measure championed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator state what committee is doing that?

Mr. KING. I stated—perhaps the Senator was out——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was absent.

Mr. KING. Recently a conference was held in this city at which representative lawyers from every State in the Union were present. I understood that it was either a part of the American Bar Association, or was held under its auspices. As to that, however, I am not certain; but there were present lawyers of ability and standing from all parts of the United States, as well as a number of Federal judges. Various matters were considered, among them being that of creating additional districts or securing more Federal judges; also the question as to the authority of Congress to create subordinate tribunals to handle misdemeanors and minor matters which engage so much of the attention of the Federal judges. The question of amending the procedure in the Federal courts and simplifying the same was also a matter of serious consideration at the conference. As I am advised, this conference held sessions for a number of days. A committee was appointed from the body of the conference to consider what legislation was required and to confer with Members of the House and the Senate with a view to securing needed legislation. As I understand, the committee which was appointed met with members of the Judiciary Committee of the House and discussed questions which came before the conference. As stated, one of the important questions was the formulation of some plan to relieve the judges of much of the work now performed by them.

The Senator realizes that under the Volstead Act, the narcotic law, and in view of many of the Federal regulations relating to health and sanitary matters, there are many penal offenses which are brought into the Federal courts. Many Federal agencies are authorized to promulgate regulations, and violations of these regulations constitute offenses.

There are a large number of statutes and regulations which provide limited punishment, and it is felt by many lawyers, as well as those who have given the matter consideration, that some inferior tribunal or commission could be created to care for these lesser matters. It goes without saying that if the Federal courts could be relieved of these matters an entirely different situation would exist. I am told that there are thousands of these misdemeanors and minor criminal matters that fill the dockets and prevent the consideration of more important matters. Of course, relief must speedily be granted, and if some suitable plan is not devised then more Federal judges must be appointed and arrangements made for additional judicial districts and additional court facilities.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to state, if the Senator will permit, that it was stated in the Judiciary Committee at our last meeting that this committee did not want to report or did not want to consider any bill that was referred to it until after next October.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And may I say that this is not a committee of the Congress to which the Senator refers; it is a committee of an outside body.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, what is it a committee of? A committee of the American Bar Association?

Mr. KING. The committee to which I refer is a committee of the Bar Association.

Mr. LODGE. Which bar association—the American Bar Association?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Is it, really?

Mr. KING. That is my understanding.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, is it not just a committee of the District Bar Association, not the American Bar Association?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. I was invited to one of the meetings of this committee or conference which was held here about two weeks ago, and at that meeting there were distinguished attorneys from all parts of the United States, as well as a number of Federal judges. It was said that every State was represented; and I recalled the impression that the conference was held pursuant to some action of the American Bar Association, and for the purpose of considering what amendments might be suggested to Federal procedure and to Federal statutes and what legislation might be enacted that would relieve this congested situation existing in a number of the districts. I may be in error as to the relation of the conference to the American Bar Association.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think it was a committee of the American Bar Association.

Mr. KING. Be that as it may, there were eminent lawyers and judges present and a committee was appointed to confer with Congress for the purpose of securing needed legislation in behalf of the courts and court procedure. A number of Congressmen and Senators were present at one meeting, among them being Representative LITTLE from Kansas, who is engaged in the codification of the Federal statutes. A committee was appointed by the conference to confer with Members of the House and Senate in relation to the matters to which I have referred.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was invited to that banquet. I think the Judiciary Committee——

Mr. KING. Oh, let the Senator say that the conference was in session for two or three days.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand it was a sort of a jumped-up committee.

Mr. KING. The Senator may call it whatever he pleases. It succeeded in bringing to Washington able lawyers from every State in this Union, as well as a number of Federal judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. It does not represent the American Bar Association, as I understand.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the committee was a committee of the American Bar Association for the purpose of arriving at a basis of increasing the pay of Federal court judges.

Mr. OVERMAN. There was a committee appointed to ask Congress to increase the pay of the judges, I know, but so far as this legislation was concerned, or any other legislation, I do not think the American Bar Association have appointed any committee.

Mr. LODGE. I did not think they had, either. I wanted to define this nebulous committee.

Mr. KING. I know that a conference has been held and a committee appointed to confer with Congress. I know that former Senator Hoke Smith attended the conference and is a member of the committee. One of the circuit judges from the State of New York attended and delivered an address and called attention to the congested condition of the docket, and the question was discussed of affording relief from the serious situation in several judicial districts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Here is the legislation.

Mr. KING. Oh, no; of a different nature from this.

Mr. LODGE. There are lots of people who are suggesting legislation to Congress; but, after all, our responsibility here is our own. I think that the two Houses of Congress are competent to decide whether or not there shall be an additional judge in this district—quite as competent as an undefined committee which has been having a dinner in Washington.

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, the observations of the Senator from Massachusetts are entirely unworthy of him.

Mr. LODGE. I am sorry to think so. The remarks of the Senator from Utah are certainly unworthy of him.

Mr. KING. I do not yield to the Senator. He criticizes distinguished lawyers and eminent judges——

Mr. LODGE. Who are these eminent judges and lawyers——

Mr. KING. I mentioned one of them.

Mr. LODGE (continuing). Who are taking over the work of the United States Congress?

Mr. KING. Oh, well, Mr. President, that is an absurd remark of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I do not yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Being abusive is of no use.

Mr. KING. The Senator is abusive and insulting to the committee.

Mr. LODGE. I am not abusive. I am asking who these great lawyers are, and the Senator can tell me only one.

Mr. KING. Oh, well, I can tell the Senator a number of them.

Mr. LODGE. Well, tell them.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will possess himself in patience, when the Senator from New York gets through, and the Senator from Massachusetts discontinues his cynical and discourteous remarks, I shall be glad to reply.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I am going to move to proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, that can not be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the Senator from Utah will not persist in his objection to this bill having consideration to-day. It is very seldom that we reach the calendar.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question. Is he not dealing with a temporary accumulation of business by appointing lifetime officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the business is steadily increasing. It shows no signs of decreasing. It is increasing all the time.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I thought it was due to this new legislation, and that that condition would soon cease to exist.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the figures presented in the report of the Attorney General's investigator indicate very clearly that exclusive of Volstead Act cases, and exclusive of selective service law cases, the normal business of the court is growing by leaps and bounds. Now, just let me state what happened.

In the fiscal year 1920 there were commenced in the southern district of New York 5,708 cases. There were terminated of that number 3,833 cases. There were pending at the close of the fiscal year on June 30, 1920, 14,250 cases.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to urge the Senator from Utah not to make this objection. My attention was called to the situation in New York at least eight years ago, when I was connected with the Attorney General's office, and it has been growing worse ever since. It amounts to a practical denial of justice to many people; and it is unfortunate for the Government, because it arouses criticism that the Government's cases are not carried on. There are other places in the country, too, where the same condition prevails; I think Chicago is getting in very bad condition; and it seems to me that we ought not to wait for some committee, however eminent it may be, to make suggestions to the Congress. Here is a condition. The New York condition is worse than that in any other place in the country; and I hope the Senator will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York tell us how many judges are provided for that district under the present law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are four judges of the district court to-day.

Now, I want to read—it will take only a second—the list of judges who have been summoned there from outside to help out:

Judge Clayton, of Montgomery, Ala.; Judge Sheppard, of Pensacola, Fla.; Judge Cushman, of Tacoma, Wash.; Judge Hutcheson, of Houston, Tex.; Judge Woodrough, of Omaha, Nebr.; Judge Anderson, of Indianapolis, Ind.; Judge Dietrich, of Boise, Idaho; Judge Neterer, of Seattle, Wash.; Judge Grubb, of Birmingham, Ala.; Judge Smith, of El Paso, Tex.; Judge Foster, of New Orleans, La.; Judge Wilson, of Fort Worth, Tex.; Judge Jack, of Shreveport, La.; Judge Ervin, of Mobile, Ala.; Judge Rose, of Baltimore, Md.; Judge Howe, of Burlington, Vt.; Judge Hazel, of Buffalo, N. Y.; Judge Sanborn, of Madison, Wis.; Judge Holmes, of Yazoo City, Miss.; and Judge Sibley, of Atlanta, Ga.

Those are the judges who in that period have been summoned there from outside to help. That is a 2-year period. They get $10 a day for every day they are there. The amount paid to each of these judges upon each of his temporary assignments is contained in this table. I have not tabulated it. I was told by a prominent attorney of New York City—who, incidentally, is a member of the lower house—that the amount paid in the aggregate was $27,000.

Now, the salary of a Federal judge is only $7,500. Two judges, which the Attorney General wants, would amount to only $15,000 a year. We are paying a great deal more than that in these temporary assignments, and the business of the court is falling hopelessly behind. If this bill can receive consideration to-day, I say very frankly that, in entire agreement with the Attorney General, I was going to move to amend the bill so as to provide for two additional judges.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am sorry that I can not comply with the request of my friend from New York. I can assure him that I shall attempt to secure action upon this matter at an early date. If no comprehensive plan is proposed, then I shall join with him in asking for the speedy passage of the bill now before us. I feel sure the committee referred to will seek early action. At the one meeting which I attended great interest was manifested in this matter and all felt the necessity of early legislation. There were three United States Senators present at this meeting; also a number of Congressmen, two Federal judges from the State of New York, as well as many lawyers, who were deeply interested in improving our judicial system.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Did this committee or this meeting resolve against giving these additional judges to New York?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. KENYON. They are in favor of it, are they not?

Mr. KING. I do not recall that that question was discussed, although it was repeatedly stated that unless some plan was devised to relieve the courts many more judges would be required.

Mr. KENYON. When will the committee meet again?

Mr. KING. It was suggested that in a number of districts there was great congestion because of the work involved in the trial of misdemeanors, and the question was discussed as to whether some inferior tribunal or commissioner could not be authorized to try misdemeanors and minor matters, including the passing upon naturalization applications.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, here is the practical question. I do not want to keep arguing with the Senator. That committee will not meet again for a long while, probably. They meet at a dinner at the Shoreham Hotel, and have a pleasant time, and try to work out these things. It is fine to assist the Congress; but they will not meet for a long time, and the Federal judiciary in many parts of this country are breaking down. They can not do the work. Judges are summoned in from other places to assist in New York.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that I am not opposing the appointment of all necessary judges. My position is that unless some plan is devised to care for small matters and misdemeanors, it will be necessary, in view of the great increase of litigation in the Federal courts, to create additional districts and appoint many more Federal judges.

I favor dealing with the entire question now, so that we will not be called upon every few months to provide additional judges.

Mr. KENYON. Have we got to wait for this committee to have another dinner and decide what can be done?

Mr. KING. I did not suggest that at all. Let this pressure be brought to the attention of Congress and there will be some action. I think it is a good thing that there should be some pressure, and then Congress will consider this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

ASHLEY NATIONAL FOREST.

The bill (S. 671) to add certain lands to the Ashley National Forest was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands in Wyoming are hereby added to the Ashley National Forest and made subject to all laws affecting national forests, but the addition of these lands shall not affect adversely any valid existing settlement or entry made prior to the passage of this act:

Section 14, township 12 north, range 117 west, and section 20, township 12 north, range 116 west, sixth principal meridian, and also the following-described tract:

Beginning at the east quarter corner of section 20, township 12 north, range 114 west, sixth principal meridian; thence east to the center of section 21; thence north to the north quarter corner of section 21; thence east to the northeast corner of section 21; thence north to the northeast corner of section 28, township 13 north, range 114 west; thence west to the southeast corner of section 19, same township and range; thence north to the east quarter corner of said section 19; thence west to the east quarter corner of section 22, township 13 north, range 115 west; thence south to the southeast corner of said section 22; thence west to the south quarter corner of said section 22; thence south to the center of section 27, same township and range; thence west to the center of section 25, township 13 north, range 116 west; thence south to the south quarter corner of said section 25; thence west to the south quarter corner of section 26, same township and range; thence south to the center of section 35, same township and range; thence west to the west quarter corner of section 33, same township and range; thence north to the northeast corner of section 29; thence west to the southwest corner of section 19, same township and range; thence south to the southwest corner of section 7, township 12 north, range 116 west; thence east to the southeast corner of section 12, same township and range; thence south along the range line between ranges 115 and 116 west to the boundary line between the States of Wyoming and Utah; thence east along said State boundary line to the section line between sections 27 and 28 of township 12 north, range 115 west, the boundary of the Ashley National Forest.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following:

Thence north to the northwest corner of section 22; thence east to the northeast corner of said section 22; thence north to the southwest corner of section 11, all in said township 12 north, range 115 west; thence east to the southwest corner of section 8, township 12 north, range 114 west; thence south to the east quarter corner of section 20, township 12 north, range 114 west which is the place of beginning.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC PARK IN CONVERSE COUNTY, WYO.

The bill (H. R. 2428) granting certain lands to Converse County, Wyo., for a public park was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the public lands within the areas hereinafter described be, and the same are hereby, granted and conveyed to Converse County, Wyo., in trust, for the purposes of a public park, reserving, however, to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits within said lands and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, to wit: Lots 12 to 19, inclusive, in section 6; lots 1 to 16, inclusive, in section 7; lots 2, 3, 4, 7, 9, 10, 11, and 12, in section 18; the northeast quarter northwest quarter of section 19, township 32 north, range 74 west; lots 5, 6, and 7, the south half northwest quarter, northwest quarter southeast quarter, and southwest quarter of section 1; lots 1 to 15, inclusive, and the west half northwest quarter of section 12; lots 1 to 19, inclusive, of section 13; lots 1 to 8, inclusive, lots 11 to 15, inclusive, and lots 17 to 20, inclusive, of section 24, township 32 north, range 75 west, sixth principal meridian, containing approximately 3,088.26 acres: but nothing herein contained shall in anywise affect any claim of title heretofore acquired or asserted to any of the lands herein described.

SEC. 2. That the grant herein is made upon the express condition that within 30 days of the receipt of any request therefor from the Secretary of the Interior the county clerk shall submit to the said Secretary of the Interior a report as to the use made of the land herein granted the county during the preceding period named in such request, showing compliance with the terms and conditions stated in this act; and that in the event of his failure to so report, or in the event of a showing in such report to the Secretary of the Interior that the terms of the grant have not been complied with, the grant shall be held to be forfeited, and the Attorney General of the United States shall institute suit in the proper court for the recovery of said lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIVISION OF CONSTRUCTION AND HOUSING.

The bill (S. 1890) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to establish in the National Bureau of Standards a division to be known as the division of construction and housing was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The aim and purpose of that bill have been substantially cared for in the deficiency appropriation bill we have just passed, so I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The resolution (S. Res. 67) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to hold hearings here or elsewhere and to employ a stenographer to report the same was announced as next in order.

Mr. KENYON. That can go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

The resolution (S. Res. 71) was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-seventh Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

MARTHA THOMAS.

The resolution (S. Res. 79) was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Martha Thomas, widow of George W. Thomas, late an employee of the Senate in the Senate garage, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

MINING TROUBLES IN WEST VIRGINIA.

The resolution (S. Res. 80) directing the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate the recent acts of violence in the coal fields of West Virginia and adjacent territory and the causes which led to the conditions which now exist in said territory was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE MEMORIAL.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 52) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to employees of the United States Department of Agriculture who died in the war with Germany was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] a number of questions about the joint resolution. It may be all right, but I ask that it may go over at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

BUILDINGS AT CAMP FUNSTON, KANS.

The bill (S. 851) authorizing the Secretary of War to make settlement with the lessees who erected buildings on a five-year lease on the zone at Camp Funston, Kans., and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after the word "Kansas," to strike out the period and the word "The" and to insert a comma and the word "the"; and, on page 2, after line 2, to strike out the remainder of the bill, in the following words:

Provided, That if the amount which the Secretary of War agrees to pay to any lessee is unsatisfactory to the lessee entitled to receive the same, said lessee shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the Secretary of War, and shall be entitled to sue the United States, in the United States District Court for the District of Kansas, to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just and a fair settlement therefor.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such settlement as he thinks just and proper, with the several lessees who erected buildings under a five-year lease, with renewal clauses, on the zone of Camp Funston activities and amusements, at Camp Funston, Kans., the buildings having been erected under the authority of the War Department and at the invitation of the department of camp activities, under leases which were properly approved, but which have been canceled before the expiration of any of said leases, and over the protest of the holders.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE IN MICHIGAN.

The bill (S. 1254) providing for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Michigan was announced as next in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has asked that this measure may go over until next Monday. I am very sorry that the request has been made, because I am very certain that he could not have looked into the situation at Detroit or he would not have asked that that be done at this time. I do not care, however, to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing the merits of the bill if it is to be objected to, and I am informed that the Senator from Utah will object to it, but will consent that it may go over until Monday, when he hopes to have further information in reference to this whole subject.

I can not imagine a condition more deplorable than that which exists in the eastern district of Michigan at the present time, and which has existed, and which is getting more acute every day. I am positive that there is not a Senator in this body who, if he reads the record and understands the situation, will not agree with me in this statement. But, as I said, I realize how futile it is to make an argument in reference to the matter now, and therefore I am obliged to consent that the bill shall go over.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has taken some interest in this matter of creating new additional judgeships. The Senator was a member, and a valued member, of the Committee on the Judiciary, and the committee and the country lost the services of a valuable man when he gave up membership on that committee. It may be that, having severed his connection with that committee, he is oblivious to certain facts that are before the committee. The situation with reference to my own State was such that the Federal judge there has not had a vacation, except for three weeks, in six years; he is trying cases all the time.

I advert to the case of the southern district of New York. Think of a situation where a judge has 12,000 cases pending and is working all the time. Think of a situation where citizens of the United States, who are guaranteed under the Constitution the right to a speedy trial, wait for years for a trial.

Think of the situation obtaining in the eastern district of Michigan, where citizens of the United States, who have a right to a speedy trial, in some cases wait years for a trial, through no fault of the judge or no fault of themselves—not especially criminal cases but civil cases.

We ought to meet this situation squarely and fairly. There are 8 or 10 districts in the United States where additional judgeships should be created. I assume, of course, that the appointees will not belong to the party to which I give allegiance. But that does not change the situation. These judges are to be Republicans; I presume they should be; but we can not, because of that, close our eyes to a situation such as obtains in the southern district of New York and the eastern district of Michigan.

I ask my very able friend from Utah to read the report which accompanies the bill which I reported to the Senate from the Judiciary Committee on the Arizona case. It sets out the number of cases pending before every judge in the United States. It sets out the number of cases each one disposed of in the year ending June 30, 1919. I am sure that after the Senator from Utah has read that report and has familiarized himself with the situation, he will not object to the creation of these additional judgeships, but will lend his great ability toward relieving the situation by creating these judgeships where they are so terribly needed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me assure my friend from Arizona that I have read the report, and I joined with him two years or more ago and persisted in my efforts to secure an additional judge for the State of Arizona. I have no doubt that additional judges are needed in New York and in many other places. I am not objecting to the amendation of the law and the creation of new judgeships, provided we can not devise some other method that will cure the evils of which complaint is made. It is apparent that one additional judge in New York will be inadequate. It is known that in many districts where the congestion is so great, in view of the multitudinous criminal statutes which Congress is passing, it will require not one but several additional judges. If Congress, in the light of this pressure, can devise some means by which Federal judges may be relieved of these small cases, these misdemeanors, which occupy months of the year, then it seems to me we will be accomplishing something that will be beneficial to the country.

My objection, I repeat, is not to these specific cases, but I want the acute condition to be so appealing that Congress will be compelled to deal with the question in a broad and comprehensive manner. If we give one judge to New York we will not have solved the situation. The Senator from New York stated that he would move to amend the measure to provide for two judges. I believe some plan can be devised by which the Federal judiciary will be relieved of thousands of these little inconsequential cases which now occupy their time and preclude the consideration of more important matters. I sincerely hope that the Judiciary Committee will give this matter attention and devise some plan to meet it; and if not, of course, we will have to go on and create additional judicial districts and appoint additional judges and increase the expenditures of the Federal Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Will it be asking too much of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to request him to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business until we can finish the calendar under Rule VIII and under the same order by which we have been proceeding?

Mr. NORRIS. If the call of the calendar is not to proceed any more rapidly than it has in the last hour——

Mr. SMOOT. There are only a few more bills remaining on this call of the calendar. I think it will be well enough to go through the calendar once, anyhow. There is only about a page more of bills and some of those will be objected to.

Mr. NORRIS. With the understanding that if the calendar remaining consumes an unreasonable time I may call up the unfinished business, I will ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is to take more than half an hour, I shall not insist on going through with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the calendar.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1855) to save daylight in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. WADSWORTH. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1838) to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes, relating to patents, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 8, page 1, after the word "such," to insert the word "bank," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person within the District of Columbia who, with intent to defraud, shall make, draw, utter, or deliver any check, draft, or order for the payment of money upon any bank or other depository, knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering, or delivering that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository for the payment of such check, draft, or order in full upon its presentation, shall be imprisoned for not more than one year, or be fined not more than $1,000, or both. As against the maker or drawer thereof the making, drawing, uttering, or delivering by such maker or drawer of a check, draft, or order, payment of which is refused by the drawee because of insufficient funds of the maker or drawer in its possession or control, shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to defraud and of knowledge of insufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository, provided such maker or drawer shall not have paid the holder thereof, upon demand, in person or in writing, the amount of said check, draft, or order, together with the amount of protest fees, if any. The word "credit," as used herein, shall be construed to mean arrangement or understanding, express or implied, with the bank or other depository for the payment of such check, draft, or order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LESTER A. ROCKWELL.

The bill (S. 63) for the relief of Lester A. Rockwell was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. By request I ask that this bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection the bill goes over.

LANDS IN NORTH AND SOUTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 252) to amend an act approved February 22, 1889, entitled "An act to provide for the division of Dakota into two States and to enable the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington to form constitutions and State governments, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to make donations of public lands to such States," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments, on page 2, line 10, to strike out the words "sold or," and in the same line, after the word "leased," to insert the words "for a period not longer than 20 years," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the division of Dakota into two States and to enable the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington to form constitutions and State governments, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to make donations of public lands to such States," approved February 22, 1889, be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding the following: Provided, however, That the State may, upon such terms as it may prescribe, grant such easements or rights in such lands as may be acquired in, to, or over the lands of private properties through proceedings in eminent domain: And provided further, That any of such granted lands found, after title thereto has vested in the State, to be mineral in character, may be leased for a period not longer than 20 years upon such terms and conditions as the legislature may prescribe.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF JUDICIAL CODE.

The bill (S. 745) to amend section 24 and section 256 of the Judicial Code was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment on page 1, line 12, after the words "United States" to insert "which rights and remedies when conferred by such law shall be exclusive," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That clause 3 of section 24 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Third. Of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it, and to claimants for compensation for injuries to or death of persons other than the master or members of the crew of a vessel their rights and remedies under the workmen's compensation law of any State, District, Territory, or possession of the United States, which rights and remedies when conferred by such law shall be exclusive; of all seizures on land or waters not within admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; of all prizes brought into the United States; and of all proceedings for the condemnation of property taken as prize: Provided, That the jurisdiction of the district courts shall not extend to causes arising out of injuries to or death of persons other than the master or members of the crew, for which compensation is provided by the workmen's compensation law of any State, District, Territory, or possession of the United States."

SEC. 2. That clause 3 of section 256 of the Judicial Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Third. Of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it and to claimants for compensation for injuries to or death of persons other than the master or members of the crew of a vessel, their rights and remedies under the workmen's compensation law of any State, District, Territory, or possession of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISA FROW.

The bill (S. 982) for the relief of Louisa Frow was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 8, to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$1,200," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Louisa Frow, widow of John Frow, who was killed as the result of an accident caused by a United States Navy seaplane, the sum of $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT COMMISSION OF AGRICULTURAL INQUIRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As members of the joint commission known as the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry the Chair appoints the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

RELIEF OF DISABLED EX-SERVICE MEN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the resolution to investigate all bureaus and agencies of the Government dealing with the welfare of veterans of the World War, the Chair appoints as a select committee the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

The bill (H. R. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT IN HAWAII.

The bill (S. 1675) to confer upon the Territorial courts of the Territory of Hawaii jurisdiction concurrent with the United States courts of that district of all offenses under the act of October 28, 1919, known as the national prohibition enforcement act, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, in line 7, to strike out the word "enforcement," and in line 8, after the word "act," to insert "and all acts amendatory thereof," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be conferred upon the Territorial magistrates and courts of the Territory of Hawaii jurisdiction, concurrent with the commissioners and courts of the United States for said Territory, of all offenses under the act of October 28, 1919, known as the national prohibition act, and all acts amendatory thereof, the jurisdiction of said Territorial magistrates and courts over said offenses to be the same which they now have over other criminal offenses within their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. At this point I should like to have permission to insert in the RECORD letters from the attorney general of Hawaii and the Attorney General of the United States, showing the necessity for this legislation.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. A. MITCHELL PALMER,
United States Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to your request following this morning's conversation with the governor of Hawaii and myself relative to the adequate enforcement in Hawaii of the national prohibition act, I submit the following statement:

Shortly after the passage of the Sheppard bill, which prohibited the importation, exportation, sale, and gift of alcoholic liquors in Hawaii, I took up with Mr. Huber, the United States attorney, the question of having this law amended so as to give the Territorial courts concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal district courts over any violation of the provisions of that act. Mr. Huber corresponded with Senator Sheppard relative to the matter, and the Senator expressed his willingness to have the act amended along those lines. Definite action, however, was not had in Congress, and further discussion of the amendment of the Sheppard bill is now rendered unnecessary by reason of the enactment of the national prohibition law, which, in effect, repeals the Sheppard bill. The argument that supports the proposed amendment to the Sheppard bill is of equal force when applied to the proposal to amend the national prohibition law so far as it relates to the Territory of Hawaii along the same lines.

The Territory of Hawaii consists of eight inhabited islands, extending from approximately 19° to 22° north latitude and from 154° to 160° west longitude. Many parts of these islands are isolated and lend themselves to the illicit manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors. The Federal Government maintains in Hawaii such a small force that it is practically impossible for the Federal inspectors to properly police the Territory to adequately enforce the law.

On the other hand, each island of the Territory is divided into judicial districts, each of which has a local police court, known as the district court and presided over by a district magistrate and from which an appeal lies to the circuit courts. Each of these districts has a deputy sheriff and a local police force, all of whom would have a direct official interest in the enforcement of the national prohibition law if the Territorial courts were given concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal courts. The local district courts have jurisdiction over all misdemeanors. These local deputies and police officers are in a position to discover and apprehend violators of the law and undoubtedly would do so in any event were it not for the fact that under the present law, if any of them should furnish information to the Federal authorities leading to the arrest of an offender, it would then become necessary for such deputy sheriff or police officer to go to Honolulu as a witness on behalf of the prosecution.

The fees paid by the Federal Government are not sufficient to cover the actual expenses of the witness while absent from his home. The result is that many of these officials have actual knowledge of violations of the law, but do not file any information with the Federal authorities because they do not feel that they can very well pay from their own funds any part of the expense of the prosecution. It must be remembered that under the law as it now stands the local police officers are not charged directly with any duty to enforce the national prohibition law. As an example of the way this works out, I know that the chief of detectives in the city of Hilo formerly took a very active part in the enforcement of the Sheppard bill. He was very active in reporting offenses and was very diligent in patroling his district and investigating all cases which indicated any violation of the law. After a few experiences, however, he found that his efforts along these lines were costing him a considerable sum of money every month, and under those circumstances it was but natural for him to desist from this activity, with the result that the illicit manufacture and sale of liquors went on in his district practically unchecked. This is not to be understood as a criticism of the Federal officials. They are doing all that is possible, but to adequately enforce the national prohibition law in Hawaii, under the law as it now stands, would require a much larger force of Federal deputies than would probably be allotted to Hawaii. I believe that the deputy sheriff of a district, with his small force of policemen, by reason of his intimate knowledge of everything that goes on in his district, can do more to effectively enforce the national prohibition law than a much larger force of Federal officers, who, from the very nature of things, are not intimately acquainted with the activity of that district.

The various district magistrates will also, if this amendment goes through, take a personal interest in the enforcement of the law. The amount of fines and costs collected in these district courts determine to some extent the amount of the salary paid to the district magistrates. While this is not the highest and best motive which should influence their activities, yet it would, in my opinion, result in an active enforcement of the law.

I do not believe that under the present state of the national prohibition law we can expect its active and effective enforcement. On the other hand, I am convinced from my knowledge of Hawaiian conditions acquired from 20 years' experience there, that if the local courts should be given jurisdiction concurrently with the Federal courts, it will bring about a spirit of cooperation between the local and Federal officials and go far toward the accomplishing in Hawaii of the purposes of the national prohibition act.

The governor of Hawaii authorized me to say for him that this statement meets with his approval and indorsement. The United States attorney in Hawaii, Mr. Huber, also heartily indorses the purpose of the amendment. If I can be of any service or assistance to any official here who may be interested in this question, I will be very glad to furnish any additional information that may be required. I expect to be at the Shoreham until about March 1.

I am, yours, respectfully,

HARRY IRWIN,
Attorney General of Hawaii.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1921.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Chairman Senate Judiciary Committee, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SENATOR: Since the passage of the national prohibition act the Territorial officials of Hawaii have been insistent that that act be amended so as to give the Territorial courts concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of the United States of offenses arising under that act. On April 21, 1920, the Attorney General wrote the then chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee inclosing a copy of a letter from the governor of Hawaii setting forth at length the necessity for such an amendment. I am attaching herewith a copy of that letter. The department is now in receipt of a letter from Mr. Huber, United States attorney for the district of Hawaii, again urging such an amendment. A copy of that letter is also attached.

The Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, on May 28, 1920, adopted such an amendment (S. 4296). This amendment then went to the House, but died in committee upon the adjournment of Congress.

The department agrees with the Territorial officials that such an amendment is highly desirable to relieve the congestion of the docket of the United States courts in Hawaii and to more expeditiously handle such cases in the outlying islands of the Territory. If you agree with this view, the department would be glad to see the amendment, designated in last Congress as S. 4296, reintroduced.

Respectfully,

H. M. DAUGHERTY,
Attorney General.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to confer upon the Territorial courts of the Territory of Hawaii jurisdiction concurrent with the United States courts of that district of all offenses under the act of October 28, 1919, known as the national prohibition act."

WAR-MINERALS RELIEF.

The bill (S. 843) to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection. I am sure that if he would go into the subject he would withdraw his objection for this reason: Certain funds, to wit, $9,500,000, were appropriated in the Sixty-fifth Congress to pay those men who went into the hills, laborers who went out and struck solid granite with pick and shovel and brought in minerals for the relief of our Government during the war.

A construction was put upon the act which many believed to be narrow; the excellent legal talent of my friend from Utah will perceive that the construction was narrow, for it amounted to this, that a man who went to town and read in the paper that the Government needed manganese could be paid, but when he went to the hills and communicated this information to his fellow miners, and they did not read the notice, they could not be paid.

The appropriation is already made. It is limited to the payment only of those men who actually furnished the materials in good faith, and also to those who have heretofore—over a year ago, I will say—filed their claims. The junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], who introduced the bill, I believe, could in three minutes make a statement that would convince and satisfy any Senator that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if the amendment to the bill which was offered by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] did not cure some of the narrowness of which the Senator has spoken?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; but it failed in the Sixty-fifth Congress. It did not pass the House. It passed the Senate in the Sixty-sixth Congress, but it did not pass the House. The bill which is now pending is practically the same except that the interests of the Government are even more carefully—if that could be—guarded than in the bill passed by the Senate in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that with the original bill I was very much in sympathy and aided in its preparation. I believed that those who made contracts, express or implied, with the Government, and thereupon expended time and money in the production of minerals needed by the Government should be paid; but I feel that great care must be exercised in amending the original act, lest the bars be let down and the Government subjected to enormous demands and vexatious claims. I feel sure there is a clear distinction between cases falling within the original act and those claims, if any should be preferred, arising out of losses for shrinkage in the value of farm products and the loss of markets for manufactured goods produced so abundantly during the war.

But no legislation must be enacted that would be regarded as an acknowledgment that the United States is liable for losses sustained by reason of falling prices, or the production of surplus commodities produced during the war, and in many cases by reason of the stimulating efforts of governmental officials.

I hope that this bill does not open the door for relief to all persons who may have sustained losses in their mining operations. There must be no discrimination in favor of any class. If the losses of mining operators are chargeable against the Government, then the losses of farmers and all other classes must be likewise recognized if the conditions are the same in principle or in fact.

Does the Senator feel that this bill will afford no precedent to justify those who sustained losses upon the farm or in the factory from demanding compensation?

Mr. ASHURST. In reply to the Senator I am going to read the proposed law, which provides—and I ask the Senator from Utah to listen to the language—as follows:

> That all claimants who, in response to any personal, written, or published request or demand from any of the Government agencies mentioned in said act, in good faith expended money in producing or preparing to produce any of the ores or minerals named therein and have heretofore filed their claims within the time and in the manner prescribed by said act shall be reimbursed such net losses as they may have been found to have incurred and are in justice and equity entitled to from the appropriation in said act, and that the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act be continued available for the purposes named above until all claims in said act shall be finally settled or disposed of.

Mr. President, if any farmer or any citizen in response to a request or a demand furnishes anything to this Government, he should be paid. The words "request, demand" constitute the only amendment made and the only change or difference between this bill and the bill which passed the Senate in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Mr. KING. I am in favor of the Government giving relief to those who in good faith, acting upon the requests of the United States, procured minerals which were needed in the prosecution of the war. When contracts have been entered into they should be carried out, and in those cases where agents of the Government induced individuals to open up tungsten and chrome and other mineral deposits in order that the imperative needs of the United States might be satisfied compensation should be paid as contemplated in the act first passed and of which the measure before us is amendatory.

I want justice done to those persons who heeded the call of the Government. But I am desirous of protecting the Government against any unfounded claim and against the establishment of any precedent that might be regarded as a basis for preferring claims for losses sustained by thousands of American citizens under circumstances which created no liability, moral or legal, against the United States.

Senators will recall that agencies of the Government urged the farmers, manufacturers, and indeed all classes to produce to the maximum. I recall that the War Trade Board and the Department of Agriculture urged the farmers to produce potatoes and the planters to grow cotton. Responding to those appeals immense agricultural crops were produced. Losses were sustained in many cases.

In Arizona, I am told, the farmers who produced large quantities of long-staple cotton lost heavily.

Let me ask the Senator whether he considers the Government liable for the losses sustained by the farmers of Arizona, who found no market for their cotton and other agricultural crops?

Mr. ASHURST. I am so anxious about this particular bill that I do not want to be led off into some unreturning parabola, but I can not dodge the question. I can not evade it, and therefore I have to answer it.

As to long-staple cotton, I have vexed the ears of the Senate too often urging relief to growers of long-staple cotton. When I say "long-staple cotton" I mean Egyptian, Sakellaridis, or Pima cotton. It is grown only in Egypt, in California, and in Arizona. It has great tensile strength. It was used for the wings of airplanes and for balloon fabrics. The Government urged and encouraged the growers of long-staple or Egyptian cotton to plant more cotton in the States of Arizona and California. So strong was their case and so much did it appeal to me in equity, in justice, and in conscience, that I had no hesitation in voting for a tariff on the importations of Egyptian cotton, because the growers of cotton in Arizona and California had, at the request, at the instance, and the demand of the Government, produced this cotton for airplane wings. I have been led away from the bill under discussion because I felt that I ought to answer that question, but the two cases are practically on a parity. The growers of long-staple cotton, however, are making no claim against the Government; they are pocketing their losses, though some of them are ruined men.

Mr. KING. I desire to say to the Senator that I will not make objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. But I think that the Senate should consider the bill fairly, and do justice to all to whom the Government is under obligation. I come from a mining State, and probably have constituents who will be benefited by the passage of this bill. Mr. President, that would not deter me from challenging the attention of the Senate to dangers which might flow from the enactment of this measure. The bill should be so guarded as not to constitute a precedent that might entail serious burdens upon the Government growing out of claims made by persons for losses which neither in law nor in words should be chargeable to the United States.

Mr. ASHURST. I will ask the Senator from Utah to remember that a bill similar to this passed the Sixty-sixth Congress. I will ask at this point to include in the RECORD the report on the bill which I have made from the Committee on Mines and Mining. This report is able; it is illuminating; but I did not write it. It was written by the scholarly junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], and I have practically adopted his entire report. Those who read it, I am sure, will be convinced that this bill should pass. I therefore ask permission to include in the RECORD that report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (No. 98) submitted by Mr. ASHURST on June 8 is as follows:

The Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. 843) to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This bill is almost identically the same bill which, as S. 4900, was on February 24, 1921, passed by the Senate of the Sixty-sixth Congress during its last session, but which was not presented to the House in time for action before adjournment of that Congress, on March 4, 1921. The bill proposes to amend the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919. Section 5 of that act reads:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to adjust, liquidate, and pay such net losses as have been suffered by any person, firm, or corporation by reason of producing or preparing to produce either manganese, chrome, pyrites, or tungsten in compliance with the request or demand of the Department of the Interior, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Shipping Board, or the Emergency Fleet Corporation to supply the urgent needs of the Nation in the prosecution of the war."

As this act has been administered, due to the strict and narrow construction given to the words "request or demand" found in said section, grave injustice has been done to many loyal citizens who responded to the call of their country and produced or prepared to produce these much-needed minerals, namely, manganese, chrome, pyrites, and tungsten.

When later, pursuant to the statute, bona fide claims for losses suffered by reason of producing or preparing to produce these minerals were filed with the Secretary of the Interior, it was ruled that the words "request or demand" meant and required a specific request or demand communicated personally to the claimant, who, in consequence produced or prepared to produce one or more of the minerals mentioned.

Whether this construction of the statute was correct or erroneous need not now be considered; the deplorable result was that many claims, filed in time and in due form, were wholly rejected and disallowed, and the purpose and intent of the Congress to grant relief to legitimate claimants was frustrated and defeated.

The amount of the war minerals relief appropriation by the act of March 2, 1919, was $8,500,000.

There were 1,207 claims filed in due time. Of these claims 572 were rejected under the above construction of the statute, it being held that no specific request or demand had been communicated personally to the claimant. These rejected claims amounted to $3,464,023.05. Deducting the amount of the allowed claims and the expenses of the relief commission, there remains of the $8,500,000 appropriation approximately $4,974,746.01 unused.

If these rejected claims should be allowed and paid in full, there would still remain of the appropriation $1,510,772.96 unused.

If these rejected claims should be allowed and paid at the prevailing rate, there would remain of the appropriation $3,897,434.56. It therefore appears that no additional appropriation is necessary or sought by the proposed amendment.

It will further be observed that except to more clearly define the nature or character of the communications issued by the five Government bureaus during the war to induce the domestic production of the foregoing war minerals, the proposed amendment neither affects the text nor any other provision of the original act of March 2, 1919. Moreover, the proposed amendment restricts its scope and action to those claimants only who filed their claims within the time and the manner prescribed by the original act.

It will be noted also that the proposed amendment specifically provides that relief is to be granted to those only who in good faith expended money in producing or preparing to produce any of said minerals and who are in justice and equity entitled to be reimbursed for their net losses.

No additional appropriation is necessary or sought by this proposed amendment to the act March 2, 1919.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if this bill is intended to compensate all persons for the losses sustained by them in their efforts to produce tungsten, chrome, manganese, and certain other minerals, regardless of the question of contract, or orders and directions from competent governmental authority, then it may prove to be a serious matter to the Government, because if any general statement made during the war by executive agencies, urging the people to greater production of field and farm and mine and factory and mill, is to be regarded as creating an obligation upon the part of the United States to buy the products, or meet any losses incurred in their production, it will be readily perceived that claims amounting to hundreds of millions might be presented.

Mr. ASHURST. The bill does not mean that. We had practically none of these metals for war purposes. We did not have manganese or tungsten in quantities sufficient to enable us properly to carry on the activities of war.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator a question? In reading over this report I gather that these were particular articles which the country was not in possession of and not producing.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite so.

Mr. SMITH. And that a request, and in some instances a demand, went out from the Government to individuals to produce sufficient quantities of these metals to meet the requirements of the Government, which was then engaged in war?

Mr. ASHURST. What the Senator from South Carolina says is quite true. Mr. President, so pressing was our need for these metals that we sent the Cyclops—a ship that has never returned—to Brazil. Laden with manganese to the extent of some ten or fifteen thousand tons on the 4th of March, 1918, she left port, but that unfortunate ship is still missing, and of course will never be heard from. So desperately was our Government pressed that we were urging our importers to bring manganese in from other countries and we were urging our miners to go out and extract manganese, pyrites, and tungsten because there was a lack of those metals, and they were absolutely necessary to prosecute the war at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I understand the Senators are discussing a bill that is not objected to.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] objected.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Utah to withdraw his objection.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I will forego any further remarks.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, it seems to me this bill is a bill of too much importance to be passed by unanimous consent without giving it any especial consideration. The suggestion of the Senator from Utah, it seems to me, warrants very careful study of the language of this bill to see whether or not it goes as far as he contends. I know there are some people in my State who are interested in this measure; I think something ought to be done along these lines; but in our anxiety to take care of just claims we ought not to go so far in the language of the proposed legislation as to cover all sorts of claims which might be made against the Government. While I have no opposition to the general purpose named in the bill, yet, in order that opportunity may be afforded for discussion and possibly amendment, if the Senate deems wise to amend it, I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). The Senator from Washington objects, and the bill will go over.

LAKE GEORGE, YAZOO COUNTY, MISS.

The bill (S. 1162) declaring Lake George, Yazoo County, Miss., to be an unnavigable stream was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Lake George, in Yazoo County, in the State of Mississippi, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a nonnavigable stream within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and jurisdiction over said lake is hereby declared to be vested in the State of Mississippi.

SEC. 2. That the right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of the report of the committee accompanying the bill to show why the committee took this action. The War Department is quite strongly opposed to the bill, but the two Senators from Mississippi are strongly in favor of it. One of the Senators lives in the immediate vicinity of the stream, and the committee felt disposed to act upon the desires of the two Senators from the State, notwithstanding the adverse report of the War Department. I ask to have the report printed in the RECORD so as to show clearly the facts in connection with its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report (No. 99) submitted by Mr. FLETCHER on the 9th instant is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1162) declaring Lake George, Yazoo County, Miss., to be a nonnavigable stream, having considered the same, report favorably thereon, and recommend that the bill do pass without amendment.

Both Mississippi Senators insist that Sunflower River is not navigable and the entrance to the lake and the outlet are not navigable, in fact, except in excessive high-water periods, and that Lake George can not be regarded as a navigable waterway of the United States. Evidence to that effect was submitted to the committee. The report of the War Department is attached.

The committee decided to report the bill favorably without amendment.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 6, 1921.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

The accompanying bill, S. 1162, current session, to declare Lake George, Yazoo County, Miss., a nonnavigable stream, is identical with a bill introduced in the last session of Congress (S. 5025), which was reported upon under date of February 28, 1921, as follows:

"Lake George rises in Yazoo County, Miss., and flows in a northwesterly direction to a junction with the Big Sunflower River at a point about 18 miles above the mouth of the latter stream. The total length of the lake is approximately 17 miles.

"On December 31, 1920, the lake was examined by the Engineer Department from the mouth to the 10-mile point. The open-water width was 600 to 700 feet in general, but reduced to 100 feet and less in several places by bushy growth on the lake bed. A number of sections were sounded, disclosing a maximum channel depth at 18.7 feet and a minimum depth of 15.3 feet. The water stage at the time was 18.4 feet above low water in the Big Sunflower River at the mouth of the lake.

"In the fall of 1920 a bridge was constructed across the mouth of the lake by the supervisors of Yazoo County, Miss. The plans of the structure were not submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before construction was commenced, as required by section 9 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899.

"It is learned, however, that the work was undertaken by the county officials on the presumption that the lake was not a navigable waterway of the United States within the purview of the Federal statutes.

"The bridge is a pile trestle about 644 feet long, with bents spaced at 11½ to 16½ foot centers, and with a 24½-foot log pass at the deepest part of the crossing, but so constructed as to render prompt opening impracticable and with the bottom of the stringers slightly lower than the high-water level of the last six years.

"Complaint has been made against the structure by a local mill concern, whose mill is cut off from about 1,000,000 feet of timber in the vicinity, due to insufficient clearances for navigation. The complaint was made the subject of a public hearing by the local district engineer on the 24th instant. His report has been forwarded, but has not yet been received. By telegram of the 27th instant, however, he states that the hearing developed that 15 miles of the lake is navigable half of the year; that the annual commerce is valued at about $32,000, and that the bridge is an unreasonable obstruction to navigation. He recommends that the bridge be altered to provide in the channel space an opening 60 feet wide in the clear and a vertical clearance of 10 feet above ordinary high water.

"The information before this department therefore indicates that while Lake George is used commercially only to a limited extent, it appears nevertheless to be of sufficient importance from the standpoint of navigation interests to require its protection and preservation under existing Federal laws. I am therefore led to the conclusion that the bill S. 5025, herewith, should not be favorably considered by Congress, and I so recommend."

Since that report was made, the report (referred to in the next to the last paragraph of the foregoing extract) concerning the public hearing held by the local district engineer on February 24, 1921, regarding the alteration of the bridge at the mouth of the waterway, has been received and fully considered by the Chief of Engineers. In the light of the facts therein presented and of circumstances later disclosed, he is of the opinion that present navigation on Lake George does not warrant the War Department requiring the alteration of the bridge.

So far as this department is aware, the only reason for the proposed legislation is the desire of the supervisors of Yazoo County to be relieved of possible liability under Federal laws for constructing the bridge at the mouth of the lake without obtaining approval of the plans as required by section 9 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899. As indicated, however, by the statements above, no action either against them or to require removal or alteration of the bridge appears necessary or justifiable. Even if future developments should indicate a probability that the bridge should be altered in the interests of navigation, the department would proceed in the matter in accordance with the provisions of section 18 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, which requires that interested parties be given a reasonable opportunity to be heard before changes are ordered. It is not the policy of the department to institute prosecution in the absence of a willful defiance of law, nor to require removal of nor changes in bridges, unless there are good grounds therefor.

The supervisors need fear no apprehension therefore of arbitrary action against them, and as the waterway in question is evidently a navigable water of the United States which may at some future day usefully serve commerce, it is my view that the proposed legislation is unnecessary and that, from the standpoint of public interests, the passage of the bill for such a purpose and under such circumstances would be a harmful precedent and should be opposed.

J. M. WAINWRIGHT,
Assistant Secretary of War.

PORT OF ENTRY AT FORT WORTH, TEX.

The bill (H. R. 2466) to constitute Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, a port of entry and to extend to said port the privileges of section 7 of an act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to constitute Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, a port of entry in the customs collection district of San Antonio, Tex., and provides that the privileges of section 7 of an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, as amended, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, shall be extended to the port of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I inquire what is the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the calendar, the packers bill having been temporarily laid aside in order that the calendar might be called.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We are proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was wondering if it was the purpose of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to allow the so-called packers bill interminably to be put aside.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Nebraska yielded for a half hour, and that period will be up in three minutes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yesterday the bill was laid aside for three hours.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not at the instance of the Senator from Nebraska at all that the Senate proceeded with the consideration of the calendar. The Senator from Nebraska was appealed to to allow a half hour so that we might complete the consideration of the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it required unanimous consent. I want to be courteous to Senators, but in trying to be courteous to some I find that other Senators who were not here and who, had they been here, would have had the right to object, if they had it in mind to do so, come in later and complain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the report of the committee, so as to show the necessity for the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report (No. 100) submitted by Mr. SHEPPARD on the 9th instant is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2466) to constitute Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, a port of entry and to extend to said port the privileges of section 7 of an act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," having considered the same, report favorably thereon, and recommend that the bill do pass without amendment.

The bill has the approval of the Treasury Department, as will appear by the annexed communication.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 13, 1921.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The department is in receipt of your letter of the 23d ultimo, inclosing a copy of a bill (H. R. 2466) providing for the establishment of Fort Worth, Tex., as a port of entry and a port to which merchandise may be transported under section 7 of the act of June 10, 1880, without appraisement at the port of entry.

An investigation has been made to determine the necessity of this action, and the investigating officer reports that, in his opinion, enough merchandise is imported for Fort Worth to justify the creation of that place as a customs port of entry. The investigating officer further reports that, after conferences with various business concerns in Fort Worth, he is of the opinion that sufficient merchandise would be forwarded to Fort Worth in bond from frontier ports under the immediate transportation act to justify the creation of Fort Worth as an immediate transportation port of entry.

In view of the foregoing, I am of the opinion that a commercial necessity exists which warrants the establishment of Fort Worth as a port of entry and a port to which imported merchandise may be forwarded in bond under the provisions of section 7 of the act of June 10, 1880. I therefore recommend the passage of the bill H. R. 2466.

Respectfully,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

MUD SLOUGH DIKE, ISTHMUS INLET, OREG.

The bill (H. R. 3018) granting the consent of Congress to H. H. Haynes to construct a dike across Mud Slough on Isthmus Inlet, in section 23, township 26 south, range 13 west, of Willamette meridian in Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to H. H. Haynes and his legal representatives and assigns, to construct and maintain a dike and approaches thereto across the Mud Slough on Isthmus Inlet at or near its mouth in section 23, township 26 south, range 13 west, of Willamette meridian in Oregon, in the county of Coos, in the State of Oregon: Provided, That the work shall not be commenced until the plans therefor have been filed with and approved by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no dam or dike constructed under the consent hereby granted shall be used to develop water power nor to generate electricity.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MEAT PACKING INDUSTRY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar is completed. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum. I was asked to call for a quorum when the calendar was completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McKellar	Stanfield
Borah	Harris	McKinley	Sterling
Brandegee	Heflin	McNary	Sutherland
Broussard	Johnson	Myers	Swanson
Bursum	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Trammell
Capper	Kendrick	Norris	Underwood
Cummins	Kenyon	Oddie	Wadsworth
Curtis	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	King	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Dillingham	Knox	Reed	Warren
Edge	Ladd	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Elkins	La Follette	Shortridge	Watson, Ind.
Fernald	Lenroot	Simmons	Weller
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Smith	Williams
Gerry	McCormick	Smoot	Willis
Glass	McCumber	Spencer	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, let me ask if the Senator from Nebraska does not intend to explain more fully the differences between the two bills; notably the differences in principle, if any, between section 204 of the House bill and sections 20 and 21 of the Senate bill, more especially in relation to sections 10 and 12 of that bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have assumed, and I think the committee has, that the bill which the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry proposes as a substitute for the House bill was as fully discussed and debated as anybody wanted to hear it debated. I outlined it just briefly yesterday; and I assumed, for the same reasons that the committee, after having spent so much time on hearings before, declined to hear any further evidence, that the Senate would not care to go over again the debate that was fully gone into just at the close of the last session.

I am not the sponsor of the House bill. I am opposed to the House bill. The Senator from Illinois is in favor of it. It would probably be fairer to have the House bill expounded by him if he thinks it requires any explanation. I have felt that I did not want to take up the time of the Senate in debating something that has so recently been very fully discussed and debated in all its details. For that reason, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote, and I have assumed that the Senate was.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is it not true that there are some members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry who have given it as their opinion that the House bill has certain features at least which commend themselves to those members of the committee? I thought perhaps the Senator from Nebraska, since the House has passed a bill, might care to explain to the Senate why the Senate committee summarily decided against the House bill, not in part but in toto.

Mr NORRIS. Was the Senator in the Chamber yesterday?

Mr. McCORMICK. A good part of the time.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator hear what I said about it?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; not only that, but I have read today carefully all that was said yesterday.

Mr. NORRIS. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had spent many, many weeks on hearings. Had we gone into it again we would have had another two-year session, or, at least, we felt that it was absolutely endless. There was not a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, so far as I know, who wanted to go into hearings; and the reporting back of the House bill with the Senate bill attached as an amendment was, as a matter of fact, more of a formality than anything else. I think the Senator appreciates that. Perhaps that is not the right way to do; but whatever wrong there is in it, if that is not right, we must suffer the consequences.

Mr. McCORMICK. Who must suffer the consequences?

Mr. NORRIS. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh! I thought possibly that the live-stock men and the packers might suffer the consequences.

Now, let me make myself clear, if I may. I seek to have the Senator, if he will, give the Senate the reasons, not for the report of the original bill to the Senate at the last session, but for the summary decision of the committee to reject the House bill in toto; to explain why it was that the committee found no merit in any provision of the House bill; and, as I said a moment ago, I seek especially to have the Senator, if he will, give us the opinion of the committee or of the majority of the committee on the relative merits of those provisions of the two bills to which I have referred—those provisions which relate to rules and regulations to be issued in the one instance by the commissioner and in the other by the Secretary of Agriculture, and to appeals therefrom to the courts.

I do not doubt that Senators who are lawyers by profession very readily grasp the distinction between the two bills, but there are other Senators who are not lawyers and who, like myself, have read those provisions and only by close study and by conference with their colleagues who are lawyers have been able to understand the difference between them.

If the Senator from Nebraska will turn to the RECORD of yesterday, page 2324, in the first column, he will find two considerable paragraphs containing his own remarks. I call his attention now not to what he said of the feature of the bill under which municipalities are to establish abattoirs, but to the other paragraph, in which he says:

> The House bill—and there are some things about it I do not understand; some of the definitions I have not yet been able to grasp fully—

And so on. Now, if the committee has not considered the House bill long enough for its members to understand it, I think it is due the Senate that the members of the committee should at least give to Senators, so far as their studies will permit, some explanation of the differences between the two bills, and especially in the matter of rules and appeal therefrom. Does not the Senator from Nebraska think that fair?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not questioning the fairness of it, I will say to the Senator, Mr. President, but, as I explained to the Senator before, I had no reason whatever to disguise what the facts were. After the Senate committee had prepared the bill, had once passed it through the Senate, reported it again to the Senate, and the bill as it passed the House came over, it was more a matter of form probably than anything else, and to put the matter in such parliamentary situation in the Senate that we could get the most expeditious result we took the Senate committee bill rather than the bill as it passed the House. We had no hearings upon the bill as it passed the House. It is more a matter of form than anything else. We had prepared our bill; we had reported it. It had once been passed by the Senate in practically the same form in which we reported it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, it is clear, is it not, that the bill reported by the Senate committee had been reported to the Senate before the House passed this bill? There is no question about that?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is no question about that.

Mr. KENYON. And the Senate committee bill was nearly the same as the bill that was passed by the Senate at the last session. There was a change in the commission of several members being eliminated and the regulation being put under the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. REED. The conversation on this side of the aisle has been so much louder than the addresses on the other side that I could not hear what was said over there. I can hear what is said over here very well.

Mr. KENYON. We did not want to disturb the conversation over there.

Mr. REED. I do not want to disturb it, either, but I would like to hear this colloquy, because I am interested in it.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps I have not answered fully the query of the Senator from Illinois. I was about to add that when the bill as it passed the House came to the Committee on Agriculture, in order to put the whole thing before the Senate, we reported it back at once, as a matter of form, and substituted the bill we had before reported, and which was on the calendar of the Senate. I do not think there was anything wrong about that action.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have not suggested that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's argument rather intimated that we did not consider the bill as it passed the House. We did not, any more than I have suggested, and I think any committee of the Senate would have taken the course we did. Otherwise they would never get through with anything.

I have told the Senator just what we did. The committee has not anything to cover up or conceal. If that course was wrong, as I said before, and the committee deserves condemnation or criticism for it, then we will have to suffer the consequences. If the Senator thinks that is not right, and that we ought to have at once started in on hearings on the bill as it passed the House, how long does he think we should go on with them? The Senator shakes his head, intimating that he does not think we ought to have had hearings, but that we ought to have done something more about it.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have suggested to the chairman of the committee not that they ought to have had hearing; but that, in my judgment, it is incumbent upon the committee to give to the Senate its reasons for the prompt decision which it reached and to expose to the Senate the differences between the two bills. Since the committee itself has not weighed the two bills, and for reasons which were good to the committee and which I do not now challenge, the Senate must weigh the differences between the two bills.

Who, Mr. President, since they have been with the problem for two years or more, is better able than the members of the committee, if they will, to explain the differences between the two bills and the reasons why they prefer certain outstanding features of the Senate committee bill?

A moment ago I quoted from the Senator from Nebraska. If my memory be correct, I think he also said yesterday that the bills were very much alike. If they are very much alike, then their differences can not be numerous, and the Senator and his colleagues ought to be all the more ready to explain them.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, what is it that the Senator wants the chairman or the committee members to do? Has the Senator read the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator has read both bills.

Mr. KENYON. Then does not the Senator know the differences between the bills?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator would like light from the gentlemen on the committee, who are lawyers, as to why they prefer certain provisions of the Senate committee bill to certain provisions of the bill as it passed the House; and I have referred to the sections on which I would like to have light.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing, as a member of the committee, to explain the differences between the two bills, or the chairman of the committee would be perfectly willing to do that, but I should think a man who could read them could see the differences.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the position taken by the Senator from Iowa be sound, he takes the position which some of the brethren in the legislature took when I was a member of it—that it was enough to say of a bill that "This is a good little bill and had ought to pass."

There are differences between the two bills, if I understand them, especially in the sections to which I have referred. I can see that the language of the two bills is different. I am able to do that. If I do not know the law, I know English. But if the members of the committee who are supporting the Norris bill are both willing and able, I would like to have them present to the Senate the reasons why they prefer the provisions of the Senate committee bill, as contained in sections 20 and 21, as distinguished from the provisions of the House bill, found in section 204, dealing with the matter of appeal. I refer, of course, to the sections in the respective bills which have to do with the regulations and rules to be issued by the commissioner or the Secretary of Agriculture and appeals therefrom.

If no member of the committee is willing or able to explain the provisions to which I have referred, I hope that the Senator from New York will offer the amendments he has prepared, and I shall try in the meantime to analyze those provisions, relying only on my knowledge of English, and despite my ignorance of the law, in order to present to the Senate the differences between the two bills.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to go ahead and present the differences between these two bills as I understand them. But the Senator has suggested them. Why does he not argue against the Senate committee bill, or against the bill as it passed the House, because of its provisions?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator is seeking light, naturally, from the Senators who have studied this subject for two years, or maybe three.

Mr. KENYON. We had this before the Senate for two years. It was discussed at the last session for weeks. I do not know whether the Senator was here or not; perhaps he was not. I myself talked on it a couple of days. Nobody listened to the discussion at the last session. Men had their minds practically made up, and perhaps have now, as to the issue between the Senate committee bill and the bill as it passed the House. There was not any real effort to discuss it.

I do not mean to question the Senator's remark that he is seeking light, but he has studied it and evidently believes the House provisions are better than the Senate provisions. The bill as it passed the House does not differ from the Senate committee bill in many respects. The Senator will find that the language of some of the sections is identical. We passed the bill at the last session, and we took that bill at this session as the basis of our operations. We changed from a commission to one member. The House have abolished the commission entirely. That is one of the fundamental differences. They put the entire matter under the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Senator from Nebraska explained that yesterday.

In the bill as it passed the House there is a difference in the process as to remedy. It may be a matter of fair dispute in men's minds as to which is the best, granting that anything should be done. The regulatory order under the bill as it passed the House is not made until the end of a hearing after complaint. Under the Senate committee bill the order is made, and a violation of it never becomes criminal until after it has gone to the court and been sustained by the court.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. In the Senate bill it is proposed that the commissioner can make an order without complaint. Can he act upon his own initiative?

Mr. KENYON. I am under the impression that the commissioner can instigate proceedings and then have a hearing.

Mr. KNOX. Can he make an order without a hearing?

Mr. KENYON. Not without hearing; no.

Mr. KNOX. Under the Senate committee bill?

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no. There must be hearings, and then the order is made. There is an appeal from that order and a violation of that order does not become a criminal offense until it is sustained by the court.

Mr. REED. Let me ask the Senator a question on that point. The Senator says there is an appeal from an order. I have not given this bill study yet, but is it not true that when the appeal from the order is taken every fact found by the commissioner is binding upon the court?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not understand it that way at all.

Mr. REED. That if there is any evidence whatsoever to sustain the commissioner he must be sustained?

Mr. KENYON. That was changed in the bill at the last session, as the Senator will remember. An amendment was offered on the floor by the Senator from Georgia which changed that very language.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Iowa permit an interruption there?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I just want to suggest on the particular point to which the Senator from Missouri has referred that I think both the bill as it passed the House and the Senate committee bill are exactly the same in that respect, about the weight of evidence that shall be necessary.

Mr. REED. That would not cure the evil if it exists.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I do not claim there is an evil existing that that will cure.

Mr. KENYON. That was in the original bill. That provision has been sustained by the courts. But an amendment was offered in the Senate, I remember, near the close of the discussion, in which I think the Senator from Missouri participated, and that amendment was adopted.

Mr. McCORMICK. Perhaps if I read section 10 of the Senate committee bill first, under Title II, it would direct the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the point I am making. That section reads:

> The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may make such rules, regulations, and orders as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act and may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government or of any State or political subdivision thereof or with any person.

There is nothing there about hearings.

Mr. KENYON. That is merely descriptive.

Mr. McCORMICK. Where is the provision for hearings? But before we turn to that will the Senator turn, then, to section 21?

Mr. KENYON. The copy of the bill I have seems to be cut through, and it seems to be pretty difficult to follow the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. I refer to page 36, section 10, which I just read.

Mr. KENYON. From which bill is the Senator reading?

Mr. McCORMICK. I am reading from the amended House bill.

Mr. KENYON. That is the Senate substitute.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; which is in italic print.

Mr. KENYON. I have it now.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator has it before him now?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. In that connection will the Senator permit me to read section 21, at page 44, line 22?—

> No such order of the commission shall be modified or set aside by the circuit court of appeals unless it is shown by the packer or the operator that the order is—
> First—
> unsupported by the weight of the evidence, or—
> Second—
> was issued without due notice and a reasonable opportunity having been afforded to such packer or operator for a hearing, or—
> Third—
> infringes the Constitution of the United States, or—
> Fourth—
> is beyond the jurisdiction of the commissioner.

Mr. KENYON. Go ahead with the reading.

Mr. McCORMICK. I do not think it is necessary at this juncture to go ahead with the reading, because the limitation upon the court in its review of the rules which may be issued under section 10 is explicit in that part of section 21 which I have read.

Mr. KENYON. But follow it a little further:

> The testimony and evidence taken or submitted before the commissioner, duly certified and filed as aforesaid as a part of the record, shall be considered by the court as the evidence in the case.

Then, there must be some kind of a hearing in order to have any testimony or evidence taken. That is found on line 15, page 44.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will read section 20, he will see that it provides what the hearings shall be. The Senator from Illinois asked a question in regard to the provision of the bill which provides for a hearing.

Mr. KENYON. It provides for testimony being taken before the commission and reduced to writing. That is a hearing. Then that testimony goes on up to the upper court. The court does not have to accept it. The court can reverse it and set it aside and call for a further hearing, and in any event that order, supported by the evidence, never could become a criminal offense until after the time the upper court had sustained it.

The House provision is different in that it provides for complaint being filed and a hearing had before any final order can be made. This order, as I take it, does not become final and effective until after the court has passed on it. There is a difference in the route traveled.

Mr. SMITH. Table IV, "Procedure for Violations," section 20, beginning with line 20 and going down to and including line 5 on the next page, sets out explicitly the manner in which the commission shall operate.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator will notice that there must be a notice in writing served specifying the violation and requiring the packer or operator to attend and testify at a hearing before the commissioner at the time and place designated therein, and with reasonable opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel and through witnesses. That is a hearing, and a complete hearing; but the Senator is right in saying that there is a difference in the method of arriving at results. The mere fact that section 10 provides that rules and regulations can be made must be taken into account in considering what follows, as to how that can be carried out.

Mr. McCORMICK. I can see that if this discussion has any value it is to appraise the differences between the bills.

Mr. KENYON. I was trying to point out the other differences. If the Senator will allow me to go on, I shall be glad.

Mr. McCORMICK. I shall be glad to have the Senator continue.

Mr. KENYON. I did not intend to discuss the bill, and I am simply trying to help the Senator by pointing out the differences. We concede there is a different procedure. I think in what was called the Haugen bill there is no obligatory publicity section, as in section 16 of the Senate committee substitute. That is one of the most important things, that there be publicity of operations. That is a very distinct and vital difference between the two bills.

Mr. SMITH. In what section does that occur?

Mr. KENYON. Section 16. I do not find that in the House bill. In the bill as it passed the House the power of the Secretary to require reports from packing companies is not at all clear. If the Senate should adopt the House provision there should be amendment to make that perfectly clear, because that is one of the main points, to require reports from packing companies.

Mr. SMITH. What section is that?

Mr. KENYON. I think it is not in the House bill, so I can not point to the section; but the Senate committee bill thoroughly covers it. If the Secretary, under the provisions of the bill as it passed the House, does not have reason to believe that the prohibitions of the bill are being violated and no complaint is pending, there is no way open for him whereby he can compel reports, however desirable he may consider them to be. The power of the Secretary to initiate inquiries is not as clear in the House bill as it is in the Senate committee bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator turn to section 20 of the Senate committee substitute?

Mr. KENYON. I should like to have this statement in consecutive order. Will the Senator let me finish that first?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The House bill provides that accounts shall be kept so as to disclose all transactions, but there is no provision under which uniform accounting can be required. We have thought that that is one of the real necessary things. I think if any legislation is to take effect, the two things necessary—and hardly anybody disagrees—are something that will require uniform accounting and something to make it possible to secure the greatest publicity. I think those two things are not covered in the provisions of the House bill.

Another thing that we believe is omitted is that it does not provide for regulation of the commission men, as the Senate committee substitute does. That is one of the most vital things in correcting the abuses that are claimed now to exist.

I have tried to point out fairly to the Senator from Illinois, as I understand them, the differences between the provisions of the bill as it passed the House and the proposed Senate committee substitute. We reported the bill almost in the form in which it was passed by the Senate, as I have said, changing "commission" to "a commissioner." I have already referred to that. There is no commissioner provided under the House bill. It is entirely under the Secretary of Agriculture. We did that because we had had a year of hearings on the Senate side and nearly that much of hearings on the House side. There are volumes of evidence that has been taken. We thought it was ridiculous to go on with further hearings. Senators will be advised, if they will look at those hearings, what they want to do and what is taking place in this industry. If they do not want to do anything, Senators may simply vote it down, without long arguments, so far as the committee is concerned.

I hope I have kept faith with the Senator, at least in telling him what I understand the differences are.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, there seems to be some hesitation as to discussing the respective merits of the two bills. The little I am going to say on the subject I think will apply equally to either. I do not propose to discuss the details of the bill as it passed the House or of the proposed Senate committee substitute. To be very frank about it, I have not studied it sufficiently to be able to discuss the details, but I am absolutely convinced that the general policy as written through both is fundamentally unsound; that the principle is wrong; and that it will be a grave error, particularly in these days, to enact such regulatory legislation.

It seems to me that we have had almost enough experience in the last few years in what appears to be well described by the President as too much government in business and too little business in government, through actual happenings in connection with governmental administration of what should be private interests, to make us hesitate. Some of these experiments were made necessary, I think we would all agree, because of the exigencies of the war, but now that that is behind us and we have been struggling for two and a half years to get back to a somewhat normal condition, then again to try to impose what I believe to be an entirely impractical supervision or control over business appeals to me very strongly as an entirely wrong policy.

I have full sympathy with the tremendous problems that agriculturists, cattle raisers, and others have had during recent months in different parts of the country. I have not agreed, however, with various so-called emergency measures which promised but do not give relief. These efforts to temporarily help such situations, in my judgment, have not and will not bring about such results. The bill proposed by the Senate committee, however, goes much further than an emergency proposition. Either of the bills, but speaking particularly of the Senate committee substitute now before us, is designed to control a large industry in such a manner as would appear to me not to serve the best interests of a large majority of the consuming public, but perhaps might be of some direct benefit to the cattle raisers and those directly engaged in that business, and yet I question that.

I was very much impressed with a resolution presented to the Senate yesterday by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] emanating from a State the representatives of which in the legislature should know, and undoubtedly do know, very much more about the cattle-raising business and its many ramifications than I could ever hope to know under past environments.

That resolution, which was presented to the Senate and is very short, was passed unanimously by both the house and the senate of the Legislature of Montana. It reads, in part, as follows:

> Whereas there is pending before Congress Senate bill 3944 by Gronna, Senate bills by KENDRICK and KENYON, and House bill by ANDERSON, which we consider to be detrimental to our industry, we believe the remedy for abuses of power and inefficient service by large concerns lies in strict and broad-minded supervision and not in curtailment of production that might result from the delegating of a commission with arbitrary power.

I was greatly impressed with a memorial of that character which had been unanimously passed by the Legislature of Montana, in the very center of the cattle-raising section of our country. I am afraid in the final analysis this bill will have as a result the general raising of prices of meat products—which in some cases, undoubtedly, where they have gone too low, should be raised, in order to permit a reasonable profit to those engaged in the business—but as is inferred in the resolution, will it not also result in the curtailment or control of actual output to such an extent that the general consuming public will be affected thereby in the way of higher prices? It can, in my judgment, have no other effect. Some regulation may be necessary, but do not let us take charge of transportation. We do not know how.

Being a member of a subcommittee, I have taken considerable interest in the question of trying to ascertain the reasons for the continued high price of another commodity of general use, namely, anthracite coal. It could well be asked of me, "If you feel, as you apparently have demonstrated by public utterances, that there is something wrong in the coal industry, that the prices are too high, and that that industry should be regulated or certain publicity provided through legislative enactment, then why does not the same rule apply to the cattle-raising industry?" That would be a very pertinent question. My answer, however, to that question would be this: It is a well-known fact, so far as we are able to ascertain from the reports which have been handed down to us by the departments of the Government, that anthracite coal—I think I am correct in the statement, as I recall the information—is practically the only staple product of large and general consumption to-day that has continually gone up in price since the World War and has shown absolutely no response to the general deflation throughout the country. But in my opinion even that condition would not be helped by nationalization. In the case of live-stock products and cattle the condition as to prices is certainly the opposite. The prices of meat have gone gradually down, and, as I stated awhile ago, perhaps too far in some instances, in consideration of the great costs of maintaining the ranges and the herds of cattle and all matters connected therewith. I do not believe, however, in order to bring about a proper correction, that there is any rule that will finally apply and apply correctly but the common-sense rule of supply and demand. Until we take off this curb of business control and business overregulation by the Government, we are, in my judgment, simply going to occupy continually a position which is unscientific, involving additional expense to and not finally conserving the best interests of the large consuming public of the country.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. EDGE. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. STANFIELD. Has the Senator from New Jersey found anything in the pending bill which leads him to believe that it is going to enhance the value of live stock, so far as the producer is concerned?

Mr. EDGE. No; I can not say that I have. I gathered that thought almost entirely from the expression of the memorial of the Legislature of Montana.

Mr. STANFIELD. I am inclined to think that there is nothing in the bill that will increase the value of live stock so far as the producer is concerned, but I believe that the Senator is right when he says that it will increase the cost to the consumer, and that will follow because of the additional cost in the distribution and handling of the product.

Mr. EDGE. I am very glad to have the Senator's suggestion, because it simply leads me to the development of a point I had overlooked.

Any governmental administration of distribution, transportation, or whatever it may be termed, is necessarily more expensive than private control of the same necessary distribution and transportation. All history records and demonstrates that fact, and our experience certainly should demonstrate it to the satisfaction of everyone here. When we tried to run the railroads we know what happened. With our merchant marine to-day managed by the Government, the terrific overhead expense, as disclosed by the Senator from Iowa, who is one of the sponsors of this bill, is, perhaps, without any defense at all. If the Government is going to take charge of the distribution and transportation of meat products, then, of course, I entirely agree with the Senator from Oregon that it is going to cost the consumer that much more money without the commensurate benefit to the actual raiser of the cattle.

It is the same old question of lost motion from the poor producer—who seldom gets a proper profit and frequently does not get that—through the various avenues and channels, down to the table. Then, of course, the consumer pays the freight. Therefore, with all respect for the desire and hope of Senators who have sponsored this and similar measures that it will actually help the producer, I believe they are absolutely mistaken in that conclusion.

There is, generally speaking, only one thing, in my judgment, that is going to help the producer in this country, and that is to inspire generally a feeling of confidence; that the people are going to be permitted to run their own business for a while; a feeling that the legislatures, the Congress of the country, does not believe that everybody is dishonest; that they will not be overregulated and over taken care of and over taken charge of until, one on top of the other, we pile up extravagant expenses. Of course, in the final analysis, the consumer always pays. I am convinced that all this character of legislation, especially at the present time, is absolutely unnecessary and unwise. We must have confidence if the country is to go to work again.

A few years ago—we all admit it, there is no question about it—business, because it had, perhaps, been allowed to run along without any restraint in many directions, went too far. Some business combinations were making abnormal profits, and the general public paid the bill. That was not entirely general, however, though it was found in specific instances. Then this era of regulation started in the State legislatures and in Congress. It seems to me it has gone so far that we have reached a position where there is absolutely no confidence in anybody.

We know perfectly well the economic condition of the country; that there is little development; that there is to-day little spending of money in futures or the enterprise of a few years ago. There must be some reason for that condition. In my judgment the reason is the continued feeling that whatever a man or combination of men in a perfectly legitimate way propose to do is under unnecessary suspicion; they wonder what Congress is going to do the next week or two to hold them down to a position that does not permit them to go out and really reap a proper advantage for their energy, their enterprise, their will power, and their determination, not to speak of the risk they take.

In my opinion the time has come when we should back up a little. Let us again trust the people of the country for a little while, at least, and see if they go too far in the direction of profiteering and overprofit. Do not let us regulate them out of business and strangle them until they reach such a position that we know there will be absolutely no effort or attempt to go ahead and do those necessary things which have made the country great in the days that are past.

I am prepared, as a Senator of the United States, to take that position and to take it very emphatically—to give the people a chance again to develop their own business and, to repeat the expression, to put just a little more business in government and a little less government in private business.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, I agree in part with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. I agree with him that this bill, in effect, will increase the cost of meat products to the consumer; but I am inclined to think that he is mistaken in the inference that may be drawn from his remarks that it would be of benefit to the producers. I do not believe that there is anything in this bill that in any way is going to aid the producer. It is merely going to add a greater cost to the packer in the distribution of the meat supply, which will in turn be passed to the consumer.

I hold no brief for the packers, nor do I speak for any man or any concern that is engaged wrongfully or dishonestly in business or is hiding and covering up something which is detrimental to the public interest. I am in favor of such legislation as will penalize the dishonest man and make an example of his dishonesty, but I am opposed to the character of legislation proposed by the pending bill. In my estimation, it has been conceived without taking into account or regard the possible harm that may be done.

Over a period of some 50 years there has grown up in America the greatest economically efficient institution in the world, namely, our American packing business. It is an institution to which we may justly point with pride. We are often inclined when we hear the term "packer" to think of some individual who has control of one of the essentials of life and who controls it as a monopoly to the detriment of all of the people. The term "packer," however, should include thousands and tens of thousands of people who have aggregated their money for the purpose of conducting a necessary business, for that is what it is.

The pending bill proposes, without any showing that I have been able to discover or believe to exist, to regulate these organizations composed of tens of thousands of people. To my mind it is the injection of government into business where it is not needed.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this legislation as a principle. It is socialistic and tends strongly to nationalization of industries. Most unfortunately the adherents and proponents of this legislation have taken what I believe to be the greatest and most perfect of all our essential industries for their experiment. The general public, as I have said, seems inclined to think of the "packer" as a monopolistic concern, owned, dominated, and controlled by some one individual, while in the main the facts are that the packers are owned by thousands of stockholders, who have aggregated their capital for the upbuilding of their great industrial organizations, and they have in turn perfected the best system in the world of supplying our principal food—meat products—under individual control and ownership.

Development of efficiency and economy is characteristic of individual ownership and control, whereas the Government ownership and Government control of industries has in most instances proven quite the opposite. The price of Government ownership and unnecessary interference in orderly and well-organized business is inefficiency and waste, while it has been demonstrated, as in the case of the packer, that the greatest industrial organizations and the greatest economical efficiency are developed under private ownership and personal direction.

The Haugen or House bill for which is proposed the substitution by amendment of the Norris bill, while not without objection, is the lesser of two evils; and, backed as it is by the Farm Bureau Federation, the grange, and the unanimous report of the House committee, it seems to me better to accept the House bill than the proposed amendment, as it injects Government control into private business to a less extent than does the bill which has been reported to the Senate.

Now, as to the packing industry: First, the definition of "packer" in this bill limits the jurisdiction and activities of those engaged in the slaughter of live stock and the preparation of meats for market, but does not include the activities of concerns that produce or manufacture products derived from live stock and who are not engaged in the slaughtering business or in the preparation of meats for market, as does the proposed Senate committee amendment. Apparently there has been a distinction made, for concerns which happen to be engaged in slaughtering live stock are controlled and regulated in their activities, while other concerns doing practically the same thing, except that they do not slaughter live stock, are not regulated or controlled.

In other words, under this bill packers who are engaged in manufacturing fertilizer, leather, and other by-products derived from live stock are included under the House bill as well as the proposed Senate committee amendment; but tanners, fertilizer manufacturers, glue manufacturers, leather manufacturers, and others dealing with raw materials derived from live stock who are not at the same time engaged in slaughtering live stock or preparing meats for consumption are not included within the House bill, although they are covered by the proposed amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say to the Senator that that will be the next step some day.

Mr. STANFIELD. Yes; I quite agree with the Senator, and, further than that, I should like to say to the Senator from New York that the Senate bill would not only include these kindred industries, but if we are to take this step we will advance until we will finally come to do what is being done in Russia; we will nationalize all industry. That would be the further step, in my estimation.

Second, this bill gives the Secretary of Agriculture as full inquisitorial and visitorial powers as the proposed amendment gives the live-stock commissioner, but this bill does not provide that the Secretary of Agriculture may enact rules and regulations without consulting the industry which shall have the effect of law and reasonableness which can not be reviewed in the courts as is given the commissioner in the proposed amendment. The court review in the proposed amendment is limited to the question of whether the order of the commission to cease and desist is supported by the weight of the evidence, and the court is given no authority to review the question of whether the original rule is in itself reasonable. It would seem, under the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the St. Louis Independent Packing Co. v. Houston (249 U. S., 479), that the court will not review the justness, fairness, or reasonableness of the regulation itself.

Third, this bill does not require any license or registration for private business, while the proposed amendment provides for voluntary registration which purports to give certain advantages to registrants. It seems to me that no law should make the remedies it provides dependent upon the voluntary submission to the law of the supposed wrongdoer. In the bill and the proposed amendment stockyards are treated as public utilities, and in both registration is required as to stockyard owners, commission men and buyers, including the packing-house buyers. This bill is only effective as the proposed amendment in the regulation of stockyards. If unfair practices or unreasonable rates exist at the stockyards, the Secretary of Agriculture is given full power to fix the same. In my opinion this bill is a better bill than the proposed amendment in that, first, it narrows the definition of the packers to those engaged in the slaughtering of live stock or the production of meat products and their activities in manufacturing processes and by-products.

Second, it places the jurisdiction over the packing business as well as over the stockyards in the Secretary of Agriculture, and does not create a new and additional commission or commissioner or give him power without hearing to enact rules and regulations which have the effect of law and the reasonableness of which may not be reviewed in court. It requires no registration, either compulsory or voluntary, for the packing business, but it gives the Secretary of Agriculture as full powers to investigate, require reports, compel the production of books and papers and the presence of witnesses to secure testimony under oath as does the proposed amendment.

Mr. President, as I previously stated, I am opposed to this kind of legislation because there is no necessity or particular demand for it. The time is inopportune for unneeded reform and experimental legislation. It will only tend to add to the chaotic, disorderly condition of business which to-day is developing the largest army of unemployed labor we have ever known and is precipitating untold and immeasurable suffering on the American people.

Mr. President, I want to say to you that the American people are looking to this Congress for sane and constructive legislation. They are in no humor to experiment. The President of the United States has stated, and the people have concurred with him, that it is a time for more business in Government and less Government in business.

Mr. President, there will be no legislation during this session of Congress that will so cheer American business and industry and restore confidence in government so much as to witness the sound conservatism of Congress defeating this legislation. I believe that this will be the greatest opportunity during the life of this Congress to demonstrate to the American people that the confidence which they displayed last November at the polls was not misplaced, and to-morrow, when they read in the press reports that the United States Senate has refused to legislate unneeded and revolutionary interference with well-organized, orderly, and properly directed business activities, there will be a thrill of confidence that will inspire industry and within a short time we will be back to normal business activity.

Now, I want to propose to you, Senators, that you refuse to substitute the Senate amendment for this bill.

Mr. President, I do not think the packer should go free of restrictions, nor that he should be permitted to slight a duty; but, on the other hand, I do not think that the good work he has done should be interfered with. I do not think his activities should be limited, but I believe that the packing industry has become such an essential industry to our American life that we should compel the packer to go all the way from the producer to the consumer. The packer is not looking for an opportunity to go into the retail business, if you please. He is not doing it because he does not care to have the opposition that would arise among people who are engaged in the expensive distribution of meat products. I understand that in the city of Washington there are some 800 distributing agencies, or retail butcher shops, whereas there should, perhaps, only be 40 or 50. The producer on the one end is paying for that and the consumer on the other end is paying for that duplication of effort that results in distribution under the present system. If the packer were compelled to go into the market and sell his product at a reasonable price, he would do so at a reasonable cost of distribution, and other concerns could not compete with him unless they adopted the most economical system for the conduct of their business. To that extent I think the packer should be regulated if he refuses to function and perform; but I do not believe that we should legislate to restrict his functioning and performing the duties as he has done in the past.

I will refer Senators, beginning on line 17, page 37, of the proposed committee amendment, under "Duties of packers and operators," to subdivision (c) of section 12. It says:

> (c) Engage or participate in any manner, either directly or indirectly, in the business of purchasing, manufacturing, storing, or selling foodstuffs other than live-stock products, where the effect of such participation in such business may be substantially to lessen competition in or to restrain commerce or to tend to create a monopoly in commerce.

All through this measure we find this trend of thought, and I am going to suggest to you this: If the packer does anything to substantially lessen competition, he has committed a wrong within the proposed law. In other words, if he is by his efficiency able to sell to the consuming public at a lower price—which, if the Senators will bear with me, will lessen competition—he has violated this law.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, in that connection perhaps the Senator, who knows more of the business than I do, might refer to some of the medical products which once were expensive, but which, of course, now are relatively cheap by reason of wholesale production.

Mr. STANFIELD. The Senator from Illinois is quite right. So far as the packer is concerned, we know by the investigations of the Federal Trade Commission that his profits are not abnormal. I believe—and I am speaking without the record—the Federal Trade Commission said that during the war the packer's profit should be limited to 9 per cent on turnover, and I believe that the investigation that was conducted of the large packing concerns showed that without exception they were all under 2 per cent on the turnover; or, in other words, the Federal Trade Commission granted that they were entitled to 7 per cent more than they were making.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he regards the percentage of profit on the turnover as any indication of the profit of the business, or the percentage of profit on the invested capital?

Mr. STANFIELD. It is absolutely an indication of the profit of the business. Of course, the total aggregate profit would depend upon the volume of business that they did. However, I think the Senator will agree with me that there are no other businesses, or at least very few, where they can exist with a profit of only 2 per cent on their turnover. I think that is a very, very small profit.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator again? The Senator referred to the turnover made during the war by the packers, and he gave the Federal Trade Commission as his authority.

Mr. STANFIELD. I said that I was speaking from memory, without the record.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator know that that same authority, speaking of Swift & Co., I think, said that in one of those very years, 1917, they made a profit of 33 per cent on their net worth?

Mr. STANFIELD. But I am speaking of the profit on their turnover.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand. Quite likely that is correct, that they did make the large profit on the aggregate of all their business, which was made possible by the great efficiency of their organization.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it is fair to say that the statement of the Federal Trade Commission is stoutly denied. For myself, I do not think there is a word of truth in it. The Federal Trade Commission made a calculation as to the profits made; but the assumptions upon which that calculation is based are not the assumptions which are pursued by any business concern. They insisted upon leaving out of the calculation the standing indebtedness of the concern.

Mr. STANFIELD. That is true; they did.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. STANFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to enter into a controversy now about the correctness of the Federal Trade Commission's reports, except to say that I believe they were properly made, based on facts, and are true. I cited this report, however, only as coming from the same authority that the Senator himself used as the basis of his remark that they only made a turnover profit of 2 per cent to show that while they were doing that, if you take the same authority in each case, they made 33 per cent as a matter of real profit for the year.

Mr. STANFIELD. I should like to call the Senator's attention also to the fact that I said that as I recall the Federal Trade Commission said that a reasonable profit would be 9 per cent on the turnover—a difference of 7 per cent, which was to the advantage of the consumer. I am inclined to doubt the report of the Trade Commission as to the aggregate profit; but, however that may be, if it is so, it is no reason why the packer should be penalized because through his great efficiency he made that profit, so long as he gave a service to the people that a disorganized business could not give; and that is the point I want to make to you, Senators—that a disorganized packing industry could not give the service to the people, and that the consumers will pay a much larger price for their meat if these concerns are disorganized than they are paying under the present system.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STANFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. In which case does the general consumer fare the better—in buying his supplies from a concern that shows a 2 per cent profit on the turnover or in buying his supplies from perhaps smaller concerns that must show a 15 or 20 per cent profit on the turnover in order even to maintain sufficient profits to do business?

Mr. STANFIELD. That is the point exactly. That is the advantage of this large aggregation of capital—that by reason of their combination of capital, stock ownership, association of capital, if you please, they are able to render a service to the consumer that could not be rendered if this capital were wholly disorganized.

As to the matter of competition in the packing industry, one might think by reason of the proposed legislation that all these packers were combined, combined for the purpose of restraint of trade and the manipulation of prices. Such is not the case. We find the keenest competition existing between packing concerns. In fact, in those cases that have come personally under my observation I never have seen any packing concern where I did not believe there was the keenest of competition. From the grower's standpoint, he has become prejudiced against the packer because of a radical fluctuation in market prices. Now, I wish to explain that to the Senators; and when I am explaining this I am explaining it to you from the viewpoint of one who patronizes the markets and has had considerable experience in that direction.

There is no method of controlling the supply of the markets excepting the natural, the inexorable, law of supply and demand, which operates through the price. When the receipts are heavy in the market, the price goes down, and the packer buys his stuff cheaply. Unfortunately the day that the receipts are heavy is the time when most farmers have brought their stuff to market. That is inevitable, because if such were not the case that day the receipts would not be the heaviest. The days when few farmers come to market, and the receipts are light, the market goes up. That is a natural operation, and is as it should be.

If there were a further regulation, or an arrangement between the live-stock producers that did not infringe on the rights and privileges of the packers whereby they could control their supply so that it would maintain an even and regular supply to the market there would be an even and regular market without those fluctuations, it would be beneficial.

But this proposed law is not to aid in obtaining that benefit. It is to penalize and take governmental interference into a well-organized and orderly business, because of the prejudice that exists against that business, by reason of a condition over which they, the packers, have no control. Mr. President, that is exactly what I think this bill does. I say this bill. In my opinion both the bill as it passed the House and the proposed amendment are wrong; but, for the reasons which I have stated, I believe the lesser of the two evils is the Haugen bill, or the House bill, and for that reason I intend to vote against the substitution of the Senate committee bill for the bill as it passed the House. I am against the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am not qualified, because I am not a member of the committee, to discuss the particular merits of this bill, and I am anxious to hear from members of the committee on some points as we proceed. But I do want to say a word in reply to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] particularly, also somewhat in answer to the last address in favor of Government regulation.

It is becoming a little fashionable to decry the regulation of business by Government. I think it is too late to do so. If one thing has been demonstrated in the political and economic history of the United States it is that there are certain kinds of business which ought to have Government regulation, and people who criticize this regulation, in my opinion, forget the enormous benefits that the American Nation enjoys now and which the American people have been enjoying for a number of years as the result of bold and effective assertion of the Government right to regulate certain branches of business.

Where would this country be to-day if the Government had not taken into its hands the regulation of the business of banking, a regulation which was first asserted about the middle of the last century effectively? Up to that time we had the most miserable currency that ever afflicted any people, enormous losses, nothing but uncertainty.

Mr. LODGE. The regulation of banking goes back of that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It did not become effective in the United States until legislation was passed which did away with hundreds, perhaps thousands, of wildcat banks of issue.

Mr. LODGE. State banks; that is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They were a curse to the country, and the regulation of the banking business, which did away with those bank currencies which afflicted the country, was one of the greatest boons that ever came to the United States, and regulation of banking has proceeded further than that, giving safety to the depositor and an abundance of credit to the man compelled to borrow.

Mr. STANFIELD. Wherein is banking comparable with the packing industry?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me to follow my line, I am just protesting this growing tendency to condemn the regulation of certain lines of business by the Government.

I say, in the first place, that the regulation of banking by Government proved to be one of the greatest boons to the country, and yet it was resisted and protested against by the hundreds of banks which were issuing their questionable currency at the time. When it came to legislation for the protection of the depositors, there was more resistance.

Then, when the great work was undertaken of regulating the common carriers of the United States, the railroads, it met with an enormous protest all over the country. I expect people who complain about railroad regulation, and some of its mistakes in later years, have forgotten the fact that there was a time not so many years ago when railroads were treated as private concerns, when a few men who dominated the railroad world controlled the highways of commerce, gave favors to this man and penalized that man, when there was no justice and no equality in the rights of the business of the United States upon the highways.

Railroad regulation was enforced; it at least brought justice between communities and between individuals. It resulted in a reduction of rates. It brought in a degree of competition, and it has given the United States, in my opinion, the finest railroad system in the world. With all the mistakes that have been made, we have the best railroad system in the world, with comparatively the lowest rates for passengers and for freight.

When the Government undertook railroad regulation, it had a serious problem to deal with. It had an enormously inflated capitalization; it had a great interest which resisted it. But nobody wants to go back to the time before railroads were regulated by the hand of the Government.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Can the Senator tell us whether or not the railroad commissions which were created to control railroads are not now being regulated by the railroads? And does the Senator think our freight rates are now just and equitable?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the inference of the Senator is too strong. I am not denying the fact that there are difficulties and irregularities and evils in our present system. I ask the Senator from Georgia, however, to go back in his mind, with his splendid recollection of history, to the time before railroads were regulated, and I am sure he will concede that there has been an enormous improvement since that time as the result of regulation, imperfect though it has been.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I would remind the Senator from Nebraska that with unregulated railroads we never had such a condition as this, for instance, to use a homely illustration, which brings us squarely to the facts of to-day: The president of the Farmers' Union, the largest organization of farmers in this country or any other country, the largest the world has known, told me day before yesterday that he was giving away the potatoes on his farm in Florida because the freight rate was so prohibitive he could not send them to market; and yet all of us who take our meals in the Senate restaurant below know that a dish of potatoes will cost at a rate which, if you apply it to a bushel of potatoes and count the potatoes, makes us pay from five to fifteen dollars a bushel for those potatoes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator speaks of a temporary evil which exists at this time, which may be due to the fact that railroad rates are here and there too high; but it is more largely due to the fact that the whole world is out of joint at this time, because we have not had the benefits of the peace which should have resulted by the reorganization of the world for peace.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. "Still harping on my daughter."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Senator will not divert me from my line of thought.

I want to refer to another great interest which the Governments, both State and National, have taken hold of for the purpose of regulating and which no one would think of permitting to go without regulation to-day. I speak of the insurance business of the United States. Who would go back to the time before the insurance investigations? Who would go back to the time when wildcat insurance companies, and all sorts of insurance companies, were permitted to run practically without regulation?

Mr. President, I could enlarge this list; but I am only citing these instances as a foundation for my protest against this clamor of the present day against regulation. You can not have civilized life with all of its great developments in the business world; you can not have successful civilized life in the United States without having the Government regulate these great monsters and these great interests that have come into existence.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Allow me, in justice to myself, to say that I do not antagonize the Senator's view on the line he is taking. But I would remind the Senator that I am and have been for many years in favor of governmental ownership of railroads.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I know the Senator's position very well; and I am in favor of regulation of them.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator where he finds any parallel between the laws which require insurance companies to keep certain deposits with State authorities, which can merely examine them as to their solvency, and this bill, which gives a single individual the right to make rules and regulations to suit himself, without a single limitation whatsoever upon his authority; with the added provision that if anyone violates those rules he can be sent to the penitentiary? Does the Senator see any parallel between the two?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not want to be diverted from my purpose. I am not standing here defending the provisions of the bill. I am studying them. I am going to ask the members of the committee to explain them, and if anyone objects to the provisions of the bill they can be amended here upon the floor of the Senate, I doubt not. What I am asserting is that it is in the direction of a backward step in civilization for the Congress of the United States to adopt the theory proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] that we shall abandon regulation of those concerns which have become so great that they can not be controlled by the ordinary laws of business and competition.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me another question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator believe that a business owned by one person can be regulated by another?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I believe that when, in the development of the complicated affairs of highly civilized communities the common wagon highway becomes a great railroad company, it is proper to bring in advanced ideas of regulation which would not ordinarily be applied to the highway where every man drives his own wagon or his own coach. So I say that when the business of packing, and when the marketing of live stock have passed away from the village proportions and small local management, and becomes organized on a national basis, with a few great national markets and a few great national packers, who do their business not only all over the United States but all over the world, in close touch with each other, evidently cooperating with each other, and who have often been under the suspicion of agreeing with each other for the control of the business, that then such an occasion may arise as arose when railroads were organized and took the place of the wagon highway.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. As the Senator has been apparently directing his remarks mostly to the remarks I made heretofore, I would just like to propound a question to the Senator. Does the Senator recognize at all any difference in the standards of regulation, what might be termed regulation and overregulation? The general policy of regulating from a governmental standpoint I think is universally accepted, but it should be determined absolutely, as I view it, on the merits of the proposition before us.

The regulation of the purity of food products and all such regulation by the Government are unquestionably logical and sound, but I am speaking of regulations and proposals to take over the management and control, increasing the overhead, the transportation, and the distribution expenses. The Senator must argue these questions from the standpoint of the actual facts before him, and not in a general way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is exactly what I was attempting in animadverting to the Senator's speech. He attacks the bill because it involves Government regulation. He proclaims that we now ought to stop Government regulation——

Mr. EDGE. I attempted to emphasize the reasons because of the increase of the cost of distribution transportation, which means an increase in the cost to the consumer. I directed my remarks to a specific fact.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Every one of these reforms, every one of these developments of civilized government in the direction of regulation for the protection of the consumer, has been fought just as this bill is being fought by the interests affected. The Senator speaks of pure-food regulation for the protection of the people. That was fought by those interested. The packers fought the development by Congress of those laws for the protection of the health of the people in the goods manufactured in the packing houses, but to-day the Government maintains its inspectors in those packing houses and inspects that food. That was fought by the packers at the time, but in the interest of the health of the people; yes, in the interest of the trade of the United States with foreign countries, that food is now under Government inspection, and I imagine even the packers themselves would not think of opposing it now. However, every one of these advances for the protection of the consumer has been fought by those interests.

I am anxious to hear from the members of the committee, who have carefully studied the bill, the defense for the specific provisions that are in there, and I should like to hear from Senators who attack the bill specifically what provisions they attack. I hope there will not be any further talk against the bill on the general ground that the Government has been regulating things too much, because I think one of the great advances of the age is due to the fact that the Government has taken in hand these great concerns and has proceeded to regulate them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to say anything on the pending bill with very great reluctance. I know how dear it is to the hearts of some Senators, some of my best friends, and I am willing that a bill shall be passed if it be drawn so that it does not impinge upon certain great fundamentals and if in its efforts to relieve against an evil or an alleged evil limited in its character it does not fasten upon us an evil a thousand times greater.

The first thing with which we are confronted in the consideration of the measure is the fact that it was not considered by the committee. The House of Representatives passed a bill, with how much consideration I do not know, and sent it to the Senate. The Senate committee does not pretend to have given that bill any consideration whatsoever or to have allowed any hearings upon the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the latter part of the suggestion is correct, but not the first. The committee did not have hearings, but the committee considered the bill.

Mr. REED. How long?

Mr. KENYON. Well, a couple of days.

Mr. REED. How long?

Mr. KENYON. At a couple of meetings of the committee.

Mr. REED. That means about an hour or an hour and a half at a meeting.

Mr. KENYON. I do not care to get into a controversy with the Senator, but merely to get the facts as they are. The Senator must bear in mind that the committee had reported this bill long before the House passed its bill, and when the House bill came over we simply then had practically no consideration, but reported it out.

Mr. REED. There were no hearings upon the bill.

Mr. KENYON. No; but the Senator knows there were hearings upon the former bill.

Mr. REED. There was no consideration of the bill because the Senate bill had been reported before the House bill came over, and then it seems that the committee read over the House bill at a couple sessions and then stood upon their own bill.

My experience in this body has led me to the conclusion that a failure to grant hearings upon any bill whatsoever, when hearings are desired, is the greatest of mistakes. Nearly the first great contention I had in the Senate was whether hearings should be granted upon the banking and currency bill. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was actively concerned in that controversy, and we stood side by side in it, and I have thought ever since that that was once when the Senator from Nebraska was right.

The result of those hearings was that light was thrown upon the bill. It came to us from the House of Representatives, the splendid framework of a bill, but it required many changes, in our judgment, and ultimately was changed, the total of the amendments made to the bill from the time it was introduced being, I think, 510. It was changed in many of its fundamentals, and before the discussion had ended in the Senate the Secretary of the Treasury, who had originally been opposed to hearings, was sending over amendment after amendment, asking that they be adopted.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Having had something to do with the banking and currency bill, I desire to assert that there was not a single, solitary hearing had before the Senate committee that was not practically a duplicate of hearings already had by the House on the larger problem of a reform of the banking and currency laws, of the currency, or that was not duplicated by a carefully prepared thesis in the file of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

The Senator suggests that the bill was altered in 500 particulars. So it was, mostly in punctuation points that I do not think ever should have been altered. He said it was altered in many fundamental particulars. I would be greatly obliged to him if he would name one single fundamental particular in which the bill was altered by the Senate that was not changed in conference by the House conferees.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not intend to be diverted from this question to discuss the making of the banking and currency bill. I made an assertion so plainly within the facts that I did not suppose any living human being would have the temerity to challenge that statement. I know that the Senator regards that bill as the child of his brain, and he is unwilling to admit that anybody did anything to improve its condition, either before or after birth.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator does not know that, because it is not the fact.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator rises to make that sort of statement to me, he can not further interrupt me.

Mr. GLASS. That is the truth.

Mr. REED. That sort of statement is mere insolence, the insolence of incapacity and defenselessness, and I insist that I shall not be interrupted any more by the Senator from Virginia on this or any other occasion while I am in the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. I shall respond to the Senator at the proper time.

Mr. REED. Oh, certainly.

Mr. GLASS. Before the Senator proceeds——

Mr. REED. I refuse to yield any further to the gentleman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has the floor and declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I decline now or at any other time to yield to the Senator.

The banking and currency bill came to the Senate with a certain gold reserve named in it. It was changed and materially changed. It came to the Senate with a doubtful division of power of control. By several amendments the bill was so changed that the complete control of the system was unquestionably vested in the Federal Reserve Board. Those two changes alone changed the character of the bill. I could name many more, but I do not propose to discuss it. I used an illustration so plainly within the facts that I thought no one would dispute it.

The evidence given before the Senate committee may have been all within the wonderful store of knowledge possessed by the House of Representatives, but whether it was or not the hearings were beneficial to the committee and to the Senate, and ultimately had much to do with changing the character of the bill.

Now, I do not intend to be led aside from the course of my remarks to discuss a mere illustration of a remark, however it might please or displease anyone's sensibilities.

I have heard many other bills discussed by men who are interested, and I have never heard discussions without learning something and without finding that good generally resulted. I have never heard a debate upon the floor of the Senate that has not had its effect in the formation of any bill or the changing of any bill, provided the bill was one upon which minds honestly differed. So that I say it is unfortunate that hearings were not given upon the pending bill to men who wanted to be heard, and I think the bill ought to go to the committee, that parties who are interested and concerned with it might be given an opportunity to be heard with reference to it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri knows, does he not, that we had hearings at the last session for months and months, and so did the committee of the other House? Everybody on earth who wanted to be heard had a chance to be heard. There was plainly an effort to delay the entire matter in those hearings, and delay would have resulted had hearings been granted on the bill by the Senate committee at this session. Certainly the Senator knows that evidence of all kinds has been taken and that the matter has been debated so long that Senators ought to know whether to vote the bill up or to vote it down.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator in all respects. I always like to agree with the Senator, because I like him so well personally.

Mr. KENYON. I like the Senator from Missouri just as well even when he does not agree with me. That does not affect my feelings toward him.

Mr. REED. The bill is not the same as that which was previously passed. I think it differs materially from the former bill.

As to the question of the bill being delayed until it could not be passed, that is a matter which is within the control of the committee. The committee can limit its hearings so as to fully protect itself against the disadvantage that the Senator suggests might come from holding hearings.

I have not had the opportunity, and I question whether there are many other Senators who have had the opportunity, to lay the House bill and the Senate bill side by side and analyze them, simply because we have been driving on here from day to day in the discussion of measure after measure. Every Senator has had his time occupied in serving upon committees, and frequently those committees have been in session while the Senate was in session. Without criticizing anybody—I desire to make no criticism—I wish to say that we have been going at such a rate that it has been impossible to give the attention which it deserves to a bill of this kind. I wish to call attention to two or three fundamental principles involved in the measure, but I shall not attempt now to discuss the bill except in the most general way.

We have heard two very illuminating speeches upon the question of regulation. Mr. President, every law is a regulation; it is a rule of conduct. In our lives we are regulated; in our business we are regulated; in everything we do we are regulated. How? By a rule of law which proscribes certain acts and correspondingly admits the doing of certain other acts. Examining that law, the Anglo-Saxon citizen can tell what his rights are. Through his representatives he participates in the enactment of the law. Having that rule laid down, which is of universal application to all who are alike situated, he proceeds to regulate the course of his business and of his life. That, sir, is free government.

When, however, it is provided that an individual may go into the privacy of his office and write out a rule that affects the business or the life of the citizen, and any violation of that rule becomes a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, then, instead of having government by law we have a government by the decree of an individual; and instead of the citizen being regulated by a general rule of conduct, passed in the form of a statute, he is regulated by the caprice, the whim, the will of an individual man.

Is there no difference between those two kinds of regulations? There is, sir, the difference that exists between the ukase of a czar and a statute passed by a sovereign State of this Union or a law enacted by the Congress of the United States. It is the difference between despotism and freedom, between living under a general rule of conduct that you yourself help to enact and existing under the decree, the mandate, the will of an individual. It is the difference between liberty and slavery, between the free and the bound. So, when we come to discuss the question of regulation let us understand what kind of regulation we are dealing with.

If this bill were drawn along the line of prescribing the conditions under which a business could exist and laid down those conditions, if it were drawn so as to denounce certain acts and practices as illegal and to punish the violation of the statute in that respect, then, provided its terms were reasonable and just, I would be willing to give to it all the sanction that my poor voice and vote would constitute. But if this bill proposes to establish, not a government of law but a government by an individual mind, that can be changed overnight—if that is the kind of regulation this bill prescribes, then the question is presented to us whether or not it ought to be enacted into law. That, I undertake to say, is the very keystone of this question. If such provisions are in this bill as give the right to an individual to control by his will and not by a law, then I shall be compelled to oppose the bill with whatever strength I may possess.

Let me a moment further advert to the question of regulation. The Senator from Nebraska, whom I most highly esteem and whose patriotism and desire to serve his country nobody challenges, cites as an illustration of regulation the law concerning railroads. To begin with, the railroads have always been in a class by themselves, or in a class in which they themselves and other concerns engaged in a similar business have been. They have always been subject to Government control; they have always been subject to regulation of their tariffs and their tolls. That has been true in its fundamental principles since the days when the Pharoahs built the highways of Egypt. It was true in every hour of British history. I say "railroads," but of course I am speaking of communication. It was true of the highways. The railroad was held to be a public highway and in its nature a monopoly and therefore a governmental function. Because it was a governmental function and an arm of the Government itself, the Government exercised in its behalf the power of eminent domain, under which it could be constructed across the private property of the citizen.

It has always been, in fact, a part of the Government. There were times when it was disputed that the Government could do this or that with it, but it was never disputed, I think, by sound lawyers. The time came when we passed some statutes with reference to it. I do not want to stop to criticize the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I shall not do so, but I say that the real good that came to us in the matter of the control of railroads came principally through the enactment of statutes which proscribed the doing of certain things and which made clear the duty of the railroads to do certain other things.

In this connection I may speak of insurance. What has been the character of the regulation of insurance? The regulation in almost every case has been limited to States; and the States have simply provided certain legal rules by which the company must give assurance to its patrons of the ultimate payment of its obligations. Accordingly insurance companies have been required to deposit with certain public functionaries a portion of their premiums, and have been compelled to submit to an examination, so that it could be determined whether or not they were, in fact, fraudulent concerns taking the people's money without ability, and possibly without the intent, of ever repaying those moneys. In that kind of regulation everybody believes and nobody opposes it.

However, suppose it were proposed to provide that the Federal Government should take charge and that the insurance companies should do anything and everything that some one man located in the city of Washington should say they should do, without any limitation as to his power of control. Who would say that would not injure the insurance business, and in injuring the insurance business injure that vast multitude of men and women who find in insurance security against the hazards of fire and the inevitable consequences of death?

Hence I make this distinction, and I press it home upon Senators who propose to consider this bill: We are not about to submit the business of the country or a part of the business of the country to the whims, the caprices, the judgment of a man, instead of to rules of law duly enacted in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

Now, I wish to demonstrate something to the friends of this bill which I hope they will consider. When you adopt a law, you know what the law means, or you think you know; you exercise your judgment; but when you lodge in an individual the power to make rules and regulations, without even prescribing a limitation to those he shall make, you have put into that man's hands a power that can be exercised foolishly, unwisely, or unjustly, just as you have put into his hands the power to exercise his prerogatives rightly. The power to do the right thing always implies the power to do the wrong thing, if it is vested in the discretion of a man. If you give the power to provide a rule of conduct for a business, believing in your heart that it will be exercised as you think it ought to be exercised, you have conferred upon the individual in whom you repose this authority the power to do wrong, or that which you think is wrong. There is the distinction again between this class of legislation, I fear, and the class of legislation to which I have adverted. When the law is written, it is drawn to have a certain effect, and you can judge as to its effect; but when you give me or any other individual the power to say what is legal and what is illegal, what is a crime and what is not a crime, then I may say that is a crime which possesses none of the elements of a crime. I may, on the other hand, say that is not a crime which possesses every element of destructiveness and of moral turpitude.

That is the distinction I press home upon the conscience and judgment of this body. Mr. President, I am led to this line of thought, and I shall advert to this bill only for a moment, because I presume it is not intended to force it to passage to-day. That line of thought is suggested to me by language which I find in this bill from a very hasty consideration.

There are in the bill, let me say by the way of preliminary, in Title III a large number of legal provisions aimed at bad practices of packers. Now, I have not examined that in detail, but as to that method of procedure I make no objection.

So far as I have examined these rules of positive law which it is proposed to enact, I have not yet discovered any objection to them, because they are rules of law that the packer can read, that his customer can read, that courts can read, that we can read, and that everybody can at least in a moderate sense understand. But let us see what else there is in this bill. I refer you to section 15:

> It shall be the duty of every packer and operator to comply with the provisions of this act—> and the rules, regulations, and orders which the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may from time to time prescribe in conformity with this act.

That is all right—

There is no limitation there. The commissioner is granted the broad, general, sweeping authority to prescribe rules and regulations and to make orders "in conformity with this act"; and this act does not grant a single right to anybody. It is restrictive as far as its specific powers are concerned.

> SEC. 16. Every operator and packer engaged in commerce shall keep such records and statements of account, and make such reports or returns, verified under oath or otherwise, as the commissioner shall require as will fully and correctly disclose all transactions involved in its business, and the true ownership of such business by stockholding or otherwise, in such form and at such times as the commissioner shall by order require.

I have no objection to a law that will require them to make reports, and make them in a certain form, and at a certain time; but this is not a law which it is proposed to enact. This bill proposes to give to the commissioner the right to say what kind of reports shall be made, when they shall be made, and how they shall be made.

But that is not the more serious objection:

> The commissioner may, in his discretion, prescribe uniform systems of accounts and records and require the installation and use thereof by packers or operators.

I know it will be argued that that is necessary; but it puts into the hands of one man the power to prescribe any kind of a system of accounts he may think proper. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized now to prescribe the whole system of accounting, and from his decision in the very nature of things there can be no appeal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On the question of delegating to a commission authority to make regulations the breach of which is characterized as a crime, did not the Supreme Court in the very recent case in which it decided the food control act, if that was the act, unconstitutional, decide it unconstitutional on that very ground, that a man was entitled to know in advance by a statute of Congress what constituted a crime? Did they not declare that to be the law?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am sorry to say that while I have had that decision on my desk for weeks, I have never found the time to read it and analyze it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator that I am not at all clear that I have the correct case; but certainly in one of the very recent decisions of the court, if the newspaper account of its decision was correct, it decided some such thing.

Mr. DIAL. In declaring the Lever Act unconstitutional.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was the Lever Act, if I am not mistaken. The court said that the provisions of the act, in substance, allowed a discretion as wide as the human imagination. I think that was the language of Chief Justice White.

Mr. REED. Yes. The courts have gone quite as far as they should in sustaining the right to prescribe rules and regulations by individuals. Just what limitation was placed upon the doctrine in this particular opinion I am unable to state with accuracy.

> The commissioner may, in his discretion, prescribe uniform systems of accounts and records and require the installation and use thereof by packers or operators. For the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act, or of any rule, regulation, or order issued hereunder, or of verifying any such reports or returns, any officer or agent of the Government designated by the commissioner may, during the usual hours of business, enter and inspect any place used by any packer or operator in its business, and examine any books, papers, records, or correspondence relating to such business.

Mr. President, it is barely possible that such a power as that should be lodged in one man, but I do not think so. I believe that before searches and seizures can be indulged in the judgment of a court should be invoked, and the limitations which justice, right, and law put upon search and seizure should be protected by that court.

Now, let us see how it works out. Understand, I am not claiming that the Government should not possess the right to examine into the books of any concern against which a charge is laid, always provided they proceed in accordance with the settled principles of law to get the evidence; but let us pause a moment and see what we are asked to do. We are asked to give the commissioner the authority to send a man, a clerk, anybody he pleases, down to these business institutions to demand the last scrap of paper in their files, every letter they have written, without any right of protection by any court or by any tribunal. This one man enters the place of business and practically does as he pleases. Is that in accordance with the old principles of the law under which we were reared, which is so dear to the descendants of the Anglo-Saxon race?

Now, let us read a little further:

> SEC. 17. For the efficient execution of the provisions of this act and in order to provide information for the use of Congress, it shall be the duty of any packer or operator, or any officer, agent, or employee of such packer or operator, when requested by an officer or agent of the Government designated in accordance with the provisions of this act—

"For the use of Congress!" Do you know why that is put in there? Because the authority to accomplish the desired end was doubled. Therefore it was so worded to give the Secretary of Agriculture the authority, through one of his clerks, to go out and get information that might be of use to Congress, because Congress does have the authority to investigate business institutions. I confess that I do not like the exercise of a power upon a false pretext, and that is all this is.

Now, I challenge attention to this:

When requested by an officer or agent of the Government designated in accordance with the provisions of this act to answer correctly to the best of his knowledge, under oath or otherwise, as may be required, all questions touching his knowledge of any matter authorized to be investigated under this act, or to produce any books, papers, records, or correspondence in his possession or under his control relating to such matter.

Let us see how that will work. A gentleman who can not make a living at home, for that reason will come to Washington, and under this administration I assume he will have voted the Republican ticket, or will say he did, though under the next administration his political qualification will have to be otherwise. This gentleman gets a job under the Secretary of Agriculture or under this commission, and the commissioner having appointed him, he has in turn a roving commission to go out and investigate these matters. He walks into a man's place of business. Whether this man is one of the terrible five great packers or whether he is a small packer, he comes within the purview of this bill. He says to that man: "Hold up your hand and be sworn; answer every question I ask you; bring me every book and paper you have; I want to see them."

Is that consistent with the old ideas of the law, or is it abhorrent to every principle of law we inherited from our fathers? No charge is filed. This man or this institution is not indicted; no bill in equity is filed against it; it is simply engaged in the business of killing pigs, a very necessary avocation. Nevertheless, the power is put into an individual to walk in and demand every single scrap of paper and demand to know the ins and outs of every transaction; to ascertain the exact price paid for every article purchased, the price at which it was sold, and to whom; to obtain all trade secrets and all the details of the business. How does that contrast with our ideas of the law?

Sir, under the old ideas of law, before any man could investigate the business of another it was necessary that there should be lodged in a court a complaint, and that the information sought should be pertinent to that complaint. When the citizen was summoned to appear in a tribunal, he came before a judge learned in the law, and under the protection of the law and the Constitution he delivered that which he under the law should deliver, and he was protected in all other matters.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I call the Senator's attention to a matter in this bill which illuminates the assertion just made by the Senator from Missouri? The Senator will note that the language which he has just read says that this packer or operator—and may I remind the Senator that the term "operator" will include thousands upon thousands of men who buy and sell cattle, not only on a commission basis, but who buy or sell them for themselves—shall—answer correctly, to the best of his knowledge, under oath or otherwise, as may be required, all questions touching his knowledge of any matter authorized to be investigated under this act.

Now, let us turn to that part of the bill which sets out the matters which are authorized to be investigated under this act, in order that we may have a bird's-eye view of the extent of this thing. On page 33, let me say to the Senator, under section 6, he will find stated the matters authorized to be investigated under this act, and I invite him to read them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I thank the Senator; I am coming to that a little later.

We have reached the point where our friend who walked into Washington on his uppers and who obtained a commission, swaggered into the office of some men engaged in the live-stock business and demanded, "Hold up your hand and be sworn. Bring me hither all your books and all your papers; I want to know what you have been doing. Tell me everything."

Let us see what the result is. This free-born American citizen, in whose veins there may run the lineage of all the heroes of this and other ages, whose ancestors stood and fought for their right of castle, their rights as citizens always to their day in court, is now confronted by this newly appointed gentleman with the roving commission.

"Hold up your hand and be sworn," says this autocrat, who may require him to answer all questions touching his knowledge of any matter authorized to be investigated by this act, or to produce any book, paper, record, or correspondence in his possion or under his control relating to such matter.

Now, notice this language:

Any packer or operator, or any officer, agent, or employee of such packer or operator, who, within a reasonable time prescribed by the officer or agent making the request, not exceeding 30 days from the date of the receipt of the request, willfully fails or refuses to answer such questions or to produce such books, papers, records, or correspondence, or who willfully gives any answer that is false or misleading shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"Hold up your hand and be sworn. Bring me every paper you have," says this agent. "If you do not do it, I will have you fined a thousand dollars, and I will have you sent to the penitentiary." Under this bill, the failure to obey is a complete crime in itself. This is not limited to the five great packers; this is not limited to a concern that has risen to the proportions of a trust. This bill is so drawn, as has been suggested by the Senator from New York, that it embraces practically every man engaged in the meat business.

I now read some of the definitions provided in the bill:

The term "live stock" means live or dead cattle, sheep, and swine.

The term "live-stock products" means all products and by-products of the slaughtering and meat-packing industry derived from live stock and owned or controlled by a packer.

The term "stockyard" means any place, establishment, or facility maintained and conducted at or in connection with a public market and consisting of pens or other inclosures, and their appurtenances, in which live cattle, sheep, and swine are received, held, and sold for shipment or slaughter in commerce.

The term "packer" means any person engaged in the business of slaughtering live stock or preparing live-stock products for sale in commerce, or of marketing live-stock products as a subsidiary of or an adjunct to any such slaughtering or preparing business.

The term "packer" means any person engaged in the business of slaughtering live stock or preparing live-stock products for sale in commerce.

You can get every village butcher under that, because he is engaged in slaughtering and in commerce. If he sells somebody a chunk of meat that was to be carried across the State line, or if he buys a pig that is hauled to him across the State line, then he is engaged in interstate commerce.

The term "packer" means any person engaged in the business of slaughtering live stock or preparing live-stock products for sale in commerce or of marketing live-stock products as a subsidiary of or an adjunct to any such slaughtering or preparing business.

The term "operator" means any person engaged in the business of conducting or operating a stockyard in which live stock is handled in commerce, and any trader or commission man or other person performing services wholly or partly in commerce with respect to live stock handled in or in connection with a stockyard.

I say that language is broad enough to get the breeder who raises a dozen calves, and follows them to the stockyards and sells them.

What can be done to him?

I read now from paragraph (d), page 42:

Any person who * * * hinders, obstructs, or resists any duly authorized officer or agent of the Government in the performance of his duties under this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

What is obstruction? He is given the authority to demand these papers, and it is asserted that they must be delivered to him. Would the failure to deliver them be regarded as an obstruction? Suppose this man turns himself loose in your office and starts to take down papers to suit himself and you protest, are you guilty of this crime provided that somewhere, somehow in some of those papers there is a document that might be competent while there might be hundreds of other documents utterly incompetent?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. By what right does the Congress of the United States provide for an imprisonment of this character? It is not a contempt of court. Can it be done without the intervention of a jury?

Mr. REED. Yes; this makes it a crime, and then they file charges against you and indict you and you are tried, and if it is proven in court that you obstructed this one gentleman, then the jury would be in duty bound to convict you and the judge to sentence you.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator read into this language the intervention of a jury?

Mr. REED. My idea is that it would be construed as to this particular matter that the crime is complete, but there would be necessarily a trial by a court to determine that fact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator was discussing a few moments ago the question of the production of books and papers. Can the Senator tell us how the powers thus conferred upon the live-stock commission differ from the powers of like nature conferred upon the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. REED. I would not wish to answer that question offhand and tell the Senator the exact difference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is there any difference?

Mr. REED. I can not answer offhand. I think there is, however.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us go back to the creation originally of the Bureau of Corporations, dating, as my recollection is, from something like 1904.

Mr. REED. Allow me to say that I am not now discussing the question whether Congress has the power to do this.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, I understand.

Mr. REED. I am discussing the question whether Congress ought to do this.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And in doing it and in considering the question whether Congress ought to or not, I suppose we would be governed by such experience as we have had in the conferring of similar powers upon other commissions and officers. The Senator has painted in very glowing terms the evils that may result from the conferring of any such power, not that we have not the right to do it or the authority to do it under the Constitution, but the Senator argues that the public evils flowing from it would be very vast. I call his attention to the fact that as much as 10 or 12 years ago—yes, 14 years ago—we conferred exactly the same powers upon the Bureau of Corporations, and nobody seems to have suffered severely from it.

In 1914, seven years ago, we conferred exactly the same powers upon the Federal Trade Commission, and while considerable criticism has been directed against the Federal Trade Commission, I have not yet observed that any person has gone into court complaining about any action of the Federal Trade Commission under that specific provision of the act.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Does the Senator wish to reply to the question of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to ask the Senator a question along that line. During the time when a similar bill was before the Senate on a previous occasion I had opportunity to examine the various provisions of it, and I found that almost every provision was a duplication of existing law. I am speaking now from memory, but I do not recall to have found section (d) as it is now written duplicated in existing law, authorizing either the Federal Trade Commission or the Bureau of Corporations or anybody else to punish for failure to obey or to produce books and papers. But the Senator from Montana has the book before him, and it may be that provision is duplicated. However, it strikes me that this is not the language of existing law.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have before me the Federal Trade Commission act, and, although the language is not exactly the same, the operation is identical. The Federal Trade Commission is given authority to demand books and papers of any corporation it investigates relating to the subject under investigation, and if it fails to produce them then the Federal Trade Commission may apply to a court for an order, just as the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Bureau of Corporations may apply for an order to produce papers.

Mr. STANLEY. But I do not see, in reading section (d) of this act, there is anything of that kind in section (d).

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is not possible to confer upon a commission power to punish for contempt.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator the acts referred to?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to stop to analyze other acts at this time. It would be a very proper matter for separate discussion. I had not understood it to be the law that the Federal Trade Commission could send an agent into the office of a business concern, and if that concern refused to answer every question he asked them such refusal in itself constituted a crime. Does the Senator understand that to be the situation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand the language to be practically the same in both cases. I have both of the acts before me. I would be very glad to read them into the RECORD. The Senator said "answer any question." Of course, no law would require him to answer any question. The materiality of the question is always addressed to the court upon an application to punish for contempt.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, if the question is entirely irrelevant and impertinent, there would be no punishment for contempt for refusing to answer. So if a book or paper that is demanded has no relevancy to the subject to be investigated, the party may refuse to produce it, and then it becomes a question, upon application to punish for contempt, as to whether it is or is not relevant.

Mr. REED. This is not, however, a matter of punishment for contempt. The failure to produce the paper is in itself a substantive crime.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me say to the Senator that exactly the same proposition is applicable to investigations by committees of this body. A person called before a committee of the Senate and interrogated concerning any matter falling within the jurisdiction of the committee and who declines to answer makes himself criminally responsible.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. There is a vast difference between contumacy of a witness, which is a substantive fact, or a failure to produce a book or paper, which is a substantive fact, and the conclusion of an employee, however humble or autocratic he may be, that he is being in some way hindered or obstructed. That is where the bill is broader, as I recall, than acts usually are which provide for the production of books or papers or against contumacy on the part of anyone.

Mr. REED. It is utterly useless to discuss, without the acts before me, what has been done previously, and whether we have passed laws of this drastic nature. I am not addressing myself to the question of power, but to the question of right. What ought we to do? What is wise and what is unwise for us to do?

As to the other question, speaking now offhand, without an examination, it is my notion that the bill goes further than any law that we ever enacted, and I think that will be found upon examination to be true.

Whether that is true or not true, the question now is whether we are going to permit an individual against whom no charge has been filed to be haled before another individual and compelled to disclose his entire business, and, if he fails in any respect, to send him to the penitentiary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was tempted to ask the Senator a question because of his assertion that the provisions of the bill go further than any other act. I notice that the bill on page 39 provides that the commissioners may fix the charges and rates to be observed by operators. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether there is going to be any attempt to assert the right to fix the price of live stock that is sold. They fix the price for the services of the operator, who is defined to be the man who keeps the stockyards or the commission merchant. That definition appears at the foot of page 30. That goes the limit, as it seems to me. A farmer brings his stock to the stockyards, and there he sells it, and the next day the purchaser ships it on a train to some other State. The commissioner fixes the price of everything done in connection with the cattle by the operator, the stockyards, or the commission man connected with the service.

If we have the right to fix the commissions and the price that the stockyards keeper shall charge for keeping the cattle overnight and for feeding them, is it intended that the commissioner shall fix the price of beef or cattle? I am induced to refer to this by reason of the Senator saying that the bill goes further than any legislation we have ever enacted.

Mr. REED. I was speaking with reference to the right of invasion. The question the Senator asks is a pertinent one, and may possibly be answered later on, when the committee concludes to enlighten us.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator think the bill provides for any such thing? There was certainly no such intention.

Mr. REED. I have not examined that phase of it.

I call attention again to the language which I was discussing and the language which follows. It declares that a number of things shall be illegal—if any person fails or refuses to make full and true entries, alters, mutilates, conceals, or destroys any account or record, makes any false or fraudulent statements, and then—

(d) Hinders, obstructs, or resists any duly authorized officer or agent of the Government in the performance of his duties under this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Each day during any part of which a condition, practice, omission, or course of action punishable under this section is maintained or continued shall constitute a separate violation thereof and shall be punished as a separate offense.

A man might easily be sent to the penitentiary for 100 years if some practice, afterwards declared to be wrong or in violation of the mandate of this demigod whom it is proposed to put in charge of the business, should happen to have run along for a hundred days.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Demigod or demagogue?

Mr. REED. Well, I think, perhaps, he will be a demagogue, and I accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. But notice the next section:

SEC. 19. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any agent, officer, or other person acting for or employed by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation within the scope of his employment or office shall in every case also be deemed the act, omission, or failure of such individual, partnership, association, or corporation as well as that of the person.

There was not written into the code of Draco any more abominable provision than that. Under that provision, should it be sustained by the courts as written, if this commissioner came to a clerk who operated a butcher shop for a proprietor 100 miles away and said to this clerk, "I represent this great man at Washington, and I propose to examine the books," and the agent said, "You can not examine them," not only could the agent be sent to the penitentiary, but the proprietor as well. There is no requirement in the bill that the thing done shall be done with the knowledge or consent or with the guilty sanction and purpose of the proprietor. All that is necessary—and the language does not admit of any other construction—is that there shall be an—omission or failure of any agent, officer, or other person acting for or employed by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation within the scope of his employment or office—

Of course, that means in the business in which he is engaged. Such omission or failure—shall in every case also be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such individual, partnership, association, or corporation, as well as that of the person.

Can we afford to pass a law like that? I undertake to say that its parallel can not be found in the decrees or laws, by whatever name they may be designated, of Turkey. It is not said, "Provided, however, That the employer or the partner shall have aided, abetted, or had guilty knowledge of the act." All that is necessary is that he shall have hired a man and that that man has done a particular thing.

I suppose it will be argued that the courts would intervene there and would say that he who has no knowledge and no intent, under the Constitution of the United States can not be held, but I am dealing now with the language of the proposed act, and I am not quite willing to expect courts alone to write the humanities into the act, which ought to be put there by Congress itself.

Some recent observations have led me to believe that the courts are entirely too likely to sustain whatever is done here.

I now call attention to another provision which shifts the burden of proof in criminal cases, and annihilates a principle of law that has stood for 500 years. The rule in every criminal case is that the defendant is presumed to be innocent and that that presumption accompanies him throughout the trial and entitles him to acquittal unless the jury is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt. There is no jury provided in the civil phases of the bill. I am not prepared to say at this moment what kind of procedure the bill outlines in the case of criminal acts, but I assume there would have to be an indictment. The rule of evidence has always been as to the plaintiff and defendant that upon the plaintiff rests the burden of proof and that the proof must be great enough to offset the balance that exists between the evidence and create a genuine preponderance. It is provided here that the hearings shall be had before the commissioner. Then the case may be taken to the courts; but section 21 provides that—

No such order of the commissioner shall be modified or set aside by the circuit court of appeals unless it is shown by the packer or operator that the order is unsupported by the weight of the evidence.

In other words, whereas the rule in civil cases, which has application here instead of the rule in criminal cases to which I adverted, has always been that the burden was upon the person making the charge, filing the bill, or bringing the complaint; the burden is here shifted from him to the defendant in the case, so that the defendant must prove himself to be free from the fault, though under the law as it has always stood the burden is upon him who charges the fact. We are, therefore, relegating ourselves to the French rule in criminal cases, that the defendant must prove himself innocent by a preponderance of the evidence. Here in civil cases we are holding that if there is any kind of evidence at all produced against a man that that man must disprove that evidence, and then bring enough proof to constitute the burden and weight of the proof in his behalf before he can go acquitted of the charge.

How will it be sought to avoid that? It will be said he has had his hearing. Where? Before a court of justice? He had his hearing before a commissioner, who is not a court, who is not an officer of a court, and probably learned neither in law nor in equity. The commissioner takes the evidence—and Heaven knows how he will take it—and having taken the evidence and having made a decision, the burden is then shifted upon the individual, upon his appeal, not only to balance that evidence but to prove that the evidence is untrue by creating a preponderance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Missouri is a very able lawyer of very wide experience, but he can not contend seriously that this is a departure from existing practice. The commissioner hears the case and makes his order; there is a proceeding in the nature of an appeal to the court of appeals. Of course, upon the appeal the burden is upon the appellant to show that the decision below was wrong. That is the rule everywhere; that is the rule that obtains in all proceedings for the review of the orders of State commissions. A State railroad commission prescribes a certain rate for the transportation of freight or passengers; a provision is made in the law for a review of that decision in the court, and it is inevitably the case—almost invariably at least—that in the case of such an appeal, as in the case of an appeal in an equity case, the burden is upon the man who appeals and declares the decision was wrong to show that it is wrong.

Mr. REED. That is not true in equity cases.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes, indeed; it is true in equity cases.

Mr. REED. It is not in any court in which I ever practiced.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator challenges the statement, I will be very glad to produce repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that upon appeal the court will presume the judgment of the lower court to be correct, and that the appellant must show that it is wrong.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we are discussing questions outside of this, and again the Senator undertakes to justify this rule by saying something like it has been done before.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Let me conclude, and I will yield to the Senator in a few moments. The rule in many equity courts is that the case can be tried de novo upon the evidence adduced. The rule in some equity courts is that the court entertains a bare presumption that the case was decided correctly, and in that light examines the evidence. But let me point to the difference. Speaking now of courts, in both of the cases to which I have referred, the man had his day in court before a judge.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us take the Interstate Commerce Commission, for instance.

Mr. REED. Just a moment. Now we come to the question of commissions. It is true that certain States have provided—and I think even Congress has provided—that a decision by a board of railroad commissioners or a public-service commission is presumptively correct. Some States have gone far enough to try to write into the law—and it was in this bill when it was here before—that if there was any evidence to sustain the decision, it could not be interfered with.

This provision is an improvement over that. Nevertheless, when a man has had no day in court, no opportunity to be heard, I want to know whether the Senate of the United States is prepared to say that because a commissioner may have found against him thereupon he must go into a higher court and show that he has an actual preponderance of the evidence in his favor. I protest against it, not upon the ground that we may not have the power to do it but upon the ground that we ought not to do it.

Now I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. Is there any provision in this bill giving the accused the right to cross-examine the witnesses who appear against him before this commission?

Mr. REED. I have read it very hurriedly. I think there is a provision of that kind.

Mr. STANLEY. I understand that there is not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I should like to read into the RECORD at this time the Federal statute to which I referred a few moments ago. It dates away back to 1857, and is as follows—section 102 of the Revised Statutes:

Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100 and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than 1 month nor more than 12 months.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, why does the Senator read that? That is a case where the two great lawmaking bodies of the greatest country in the world have passed a law providing that they, through their committees, can obtain certain facts and can compel witnesses to testify; and when the witness comes here he comes before bodies that at least in presumption of law and under our theory of government represent and are the custodians of the very liberties of the people. Is there any parallel between that and the instance of an individual who walked in here or rode in here from Kansas City or from Montana, who never read a law book through in his life, who is governed by no rules of procedure, who goes into a man's private business office and demands his correspondence, his books, and his papers? Is there any parallel between the two? I can not see it.

Mr. President, I am appealing to the sponsors of this bill, I am appealing to every Senator here to take out of this bill these arbitrary powers; to write into the bill every provision which will tend to make combinations, unjust and illegal practices, corrupt and wrongful dealings illegal under the law, and in the passage of a bill of that character I will concur. I protest against any more bureaucratic government over the people of the United States. If you can do this thing not only to the great packing houses that may constitute trusts, or come within the general meaning of that term, but to every man engaged in the line of business of butchering or dealing in live stock, and if you can vest in one man in Washington the power of absolute control, the power to make rules which constitute laws—for their violation brings the same penalty as the violation of law—if you can do that in reference to all the branches of this business, then where does the Senate of the United States intend to stop?

I draw the distinction with whatever force I am capable of expressing between regulation of a thing that is a natural monopoly always subject to governmental control as railroads; I even draw a distinction between a regulation of packing houses that may have grown to such huge proportions that some people think they control markets and a bill that proposes to lay its hand upon the small dealer as well as the great. I draw a distinction between a law which pronounces its anathemas against evil practices and specifies and defines those practices and a law which vests in an individual the right in substance and effect to pass laws and to change them from day to day according to his whim, his caprice, his desire.

And now, I ask, where will we stop? If you can take over this power, not with reference to concerns that are charged with being trusts but with reference to the small as well as the great, simply because they are dealing in meat products, then, I ask, what is the limitation? The same line and course of conduct could be properly pursued with reference to coal, with reference to iron, with reference to steel, with reference to lead and zinc, with reference to wheat and corn and oats, with reference to the shoes we wear on our feet, to the clothing upon our backs, to the implements of husbandry, to household utensils, to everything that constitutes a necessity of life. Thus, we might appoint a half dozen or more men in Washington with power to control the business and lay down the rules and regulations governing all the affairs of our people, to indulge in every kind of espionage, to invade their homes, to demand the production of their books and their papers, and finally to centralize here in Washington huge machines that would in substance and effect be a socialistic oligarchy controlled by a few individuals.

When you do that, Senators, no matter what your purpose may be at the time, the ultimate effect is bound to be that men will fear to embark in business; that every institution will feel that it is governed not by law but by the will of some man or set of men in Washington. The control of business will no longer be in the laws of States but will be centered here in the minds of three or four or perhaps a dozen men. These men may be utterly unacquainted with the business they undertake to manage. A good illustration is found in the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture is made supreme in this matter. Without definite knowledge, I question whether he has ever had any practical experience in agriculture outside of writing articles, and certainly none in the matter of packing meats, unless he put up hams at home on the farm, if he ever lived there. Continue this process and you will have created such a condition that men will fear to embark in business. Just in proportion as they fear to embark in business you will hinder the growth and development of this country.

Let no man say that I am opposing laws that will limit and punish the power of monopoly. I will subscribe to any law that singles out evil practices and proposes to penalize them. That is a government of law, a government of laws that can be enforced in the courts of the land, all of them subject to the provisions of the Constitution.

It is proposed here to set up what in the end is bound to be, if we continue, a socialistic oligarchy that will bring, if not ruin, great distress upon our country, and in the end what?

Paradoxical as it may seem, I nevertheless assert that finally and in all human probability these instrumentalities you set up will be controlled by the interests themselves. It will not happen at first. It is very likely to happen in the end. There is nothing in our experimentation that leads me to believe that we can expect fortuitous results in an enterprise of this kind. I do not want to go into that, but it affords a very interesting question of study. For the present, I protest against the provisions of this bill giving these large and drastic powers to a single individual in Washington over a vast business. Is there any limitation upon his agencies, upon the number of employees he shall have? If so, I shall be glad to have my attention called to it.

I notice, in section 4—

> The commissioner is authorized to appoint such officers, employees, and agents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and to make such expenditures for rent, furniture, office equipment, printing, binding, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, stationery, motor-propelled vehicles or trucks used for official purposes, traveling expenses, and per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4 for officers, agents, and other employees, and for other contingent and miscellaneous expenses, as may be necessary efficiently to execute the purposes of this act and as may be provided for by Congress from time to time.

What does Congress do?

It appropriates money, and these institutions grow. We started the Interstate Commerce Commission with 11 employees; I do not undertake to say how many they have now. We started the Federal Trade Commission with a few employees; it now has an army of men. If it has ever done any good, I have never discovered it. But that again is another chapter.

My engagements, Mr. President, take me from the city, and I shall probably not be here to vote on this bill, and therefore I have imposed myself upon the Senate under these circumstances. I do not know whether anything I have said, or anything any man can say, will halt these processes, but I venture the statement that if you continue the concentration of power in this Government at Washington, fulfill the processes which have been going on, it will not be long before the liberties of the American people will be very seriously impaired.

I hope this bill will go back to the committee. I hope they will bring forward another bill. I care not much how drastic it may be if they will write into it the provisions of law which prohibit illegal practices and declare illegal practices which are unjust. But against a bill giving to one individual the right to control the business of thousands and tens of thousands of men, and to make arbitrary rules for their government and control, I protest with all the power that I can put into a protest.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the provisions of the pending bill at this time. I very much regret that I do not find myself in a position to discuss the details of the bill with any degree of familiarity or force or understanding.

I was in my seat to hear the measure expounded by others when the Senator who has just taken his seat stated, in the course of argument, that the bill had not been considered in committee, and that no hearings upon it were had. I rather marveled at the statement and wondered whether it was really so; that is, I wondered whether the objection was technical or real, because I recalled that when the Congress had under consideration Federal reserve legislation the same sort of objection had been voiced by the Senator from Missouri against the bill as it came over to the Senate from the House, and it seemed to me then that the objection was not real but technical.

When, a little later, the Senator made occasion to refer to the fact that after the Federal reserve bill came over from the House there were some 500 alterations in its structure, and implied that there had not been a due consideration of the bill, either in the House committee or in the House, I ventured to interrupt the Senator, in no captious mood, certainly in no spirit of discourtesy, to say that the hearings at the other end of the Capitol upon the broad problem of banking and currency reform had been most exhaustive; and I said that no hearing had before the Senate committee had adduced any evidence which was not familiar to the House committee and to the House.

I ventured to make the specific declaration—and the Senate hearings will bear out the assertion—that everything said before the Senate committee had substantively been said before the House committee, or otherwise was in the files of the House committee in the nature of written statements and theses bearing upon the question.

I did not feel disposed to permit to go into the RECORD, without dissent, the statement that the legislation in the House committee and in the House with which I had something to do had been thrown together in haphazard fashion, to such an extent, indeed, that the Senate felt obliged to alter it radically in its fundamental provisions and to change it in 500 respects. Hence, I thought it was pertinent and in order to intervene courteously and to say what I did on the subject.

I was perfectly well aware, Mr. President, from my very brief observation in the Senate, that an interruption of the Senator from Missouri, even to correct a misstatement of fact, practically amounted to inviting offense. I had observed that the Senator was intolerant of differences of viewpoint and of opinion and quick to retort sharply upon any other Senator who might presume to bring in question his infallibility of judgment or his accuracy of statement. But I conceive that a Senator should not be deterred by things of that sort.

I have never, in my 20 years of service in the Congress, been at all willing to seek the shelter of constitutional immunity to offend any man, whether a colleague or some one outside of the Congress. I do not think it is an evidence of courage any more than it is an evidence of civility.

It was a pertinent question of fact, easily determinable by reference to the RECORD, whether or not the Federal reserve bill as it came from the House was radically altered by the Senate. But when the Senator from Missouri undertook to impute to me a quality and degree of self-assumption and personal vanity by saying that he knew that I arrogated to myself the exclusive paternity of Federal reserve legislation, his assertion invited a remonstrance on my part. It was ascribing to me a thought that I had never entertained and never anywhere asserted. Hence I ventured to incur further the wrath of the Senator from Missouri by saying that it was not a fact.

That, as the RECORD will show, elicited a vituperative and offensive retort from the Senator and an exhibition of pantomime not becoming in a body of this character, in my view. But the facts in the case are not to be affected by that sort of performance, and the Senator will understand that I am not to be deterred here in the Senate by childish and contemptuous gestures.

The Senator undertook to confirm his statement with respect to the radical alterations by the Senate of the fundamental provisions of the Federal reserve act by saying this body, presumptively as the result of hearings, had radically changed the gold reserve feature of the Federal reserve bill. If I may give another exhibition of temerity I venture to assert that this is not a fact. Of course, I say that in no spirit of discourtesy or offensiveness to the distinguished Senator from Missouri. Either his statement is true or my denial of it is at fault.

The simple fact is that there was no alteration in the fundamental provision of the House bill relating to reserve. The House bill, as I recall, provided a gold reserve of 35 per cent and a commercial paper reserve of 100 per cent behind the Federal reserve notes and credits. The Senate altered the provision in some detail and made the gold reserve 40 per cent. If it is the judgment of the Senator from Missouri that this was a fundamental alteration of the bill, he is quite entitled to that view. I say it is not a fundamental alteration of the bill. It is a mere change of detail. It is not fundamental, as evidenced by the fact that, in the administration of the act, although nearly every Federal reserve bank in the system in these times of stress has gone below its lawful reserve, there has been no application of the penalty. It required no great wisdom, certainly not months of repetition in hearings, to change the gold reserve from 35 to 40 per cent.

The Senator alleged one other thing to sustain his contention that as a result of the hearings the Senate had radically altered the fundamental provisions of the Federal reserve bill as it came from the House. He said it had radically changed the system of control, meaning, I assume, the administration of the act by the Federal Reserve Board. I am sure that upon reflection the Senator himself will not want his statement to stand in the RECORD undisputed. In what respect, I ask, was the control feature of the bill altered by the Senate? In one particular of no earthly consequence to the administration of the act: The House bill made the Secretary of Agriculture an ex officio member of the Federal Reserve Board. The Senate struck off the name of the Secretary of Agriculture, leaving only two ex officio members of the board and increasing the number of presidential appointees from four to five. Was that a fundamental alteration of the bill? If the Senator from Missouri is of that mind, very well; but I think it was an utterly inconsequential and trivial alteration of the bill. Whether or not it should have been made I am not yet quite certain.

The hearings on the other side of the Capitol were participated in by every great interest in the country and by every great group. We had professors of political economy like Kemmerer, of Princeton, and Fisher, of Yale. We had great bankers like Warburg and Hepburn, of the East, and Forgan and Reynolds of the West. We had central reserve bankers and reserve city and country bankers. We had representatives of the American Federation of Labor speaking for that group of men. We had representatives of the great farmers' organizations of the country speaking for that interest. We had representatives of the credit men's association of the United States and of the chambers of commerce. We had before us the considered judgment, expressed without reserve or qualification, of every business interest in the United States.

The Senate committee heard the same bankers whom we had heard and a few more bankers. It had not a representative of the farming industry before it. It had not a representative of the great laboring masses of the country before it. It had nothing but those bankers hammering over old brass and, as I said on another occasion, one of the "most pestiferous currency cranks" that ever disturbed the peace of mind of a congressional committee. Yet the Senator in the course of his remarks upon the packers' bill undertook to imply that those of us on the other side of the Capitol had flung together in haphazard fashion a bill that had to be radically altered here.

I have said in other forums, before the American Bankers' Association and other informed bodies—once in the presence of the Senator from Missouri—that I challenged any man to show wherein the fundamental provisions of the House currency bill had been altered by the Senate; altered, it is true, but when we went into conference the two conferees on the part of the House restored the bill to its original integrity.

It was unkind—well, I will not say unkind, because the Senator from Missouri has no special reason to be kind to me—it was rather an offensive suggestion, unwarranted by anything that I had said, for the Senator from Missouri to assert that I appropriated to myself the exclusive paternity of the Federal reserve legislation.

Federal reserve legislation is the product of no single mind. It is the fruit of common counsel by men of observation and experience and of patriotic desire to serve the country by remedying a situation that had for nearly 50 years periodically caused intense distress. Never on any occasion anywhere have I sought to appropriate exclusive credit or any credit whatsoever to myself. I have very frequently repelled the suggestion that I had anything more than a modest and honest part in the construction of that legislation.

Oh, Mr. President, I might say other things, but I think this is not the place to give utterance to a man's resentment, but rather his deliberate judgment. I conclude by again putting the Senator from Missouri upon notice that whenever he makes a statement concerning me personally he will not avoid a proper answer by such a puerile performance as he ventured upon this afternoon.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we are, in my opinion, pursuing a rather small subject at some length. Now, let us see what is the head and front of my offending. Discussing the pending bill, I made the remark that there were no hearings upon the pending bill. I believe I said originally that there had been no consideration in the committee, an inadvertent statement which was corrected the moment my attention was called to it.

Now, I am going to say to the Senator from Virginia that he may have misunderstood what I said. He clearly did misunderstand it, from his remarks. I took no offense at anything he said until he bluntly said that what I said was not true.

Mr. GLASS. If I may venture to interrupt the Senator, I desire to ask him in this connection to state just what he said.

Mr. REED. I will do so. I have the record. I have not even read it, having just sent for it. I was speaking of the hearings on the banking and currency bill, and I said:

> My experience in this body has led me to the conclusion that a failure to grant hearings upon any bill whatsoever, when hearings are desired, is the greatest of mistakes. Nearly the first great contention I had in the Senate was whether hearings should be granted upon the banking and currency bill.

Of course, I was speaking about the Senate, not the House, I could not have had any connection about the hearings in the House. I continue reading:

> The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was actively concerned in that controversy, and we stood side by side in it, and I have thought ever since that that was once when the Senator from Nebraska was right.

Of course, I was jesting with my friend from Nebraska.

The result of those hearings was that light was thrown upon the bill.

I was speaking about hearings in the Senate and not in the House. I never said this bill did not have hearings in the House.

The result of those hearings was that light was thrown upon the bill—

So far as we were concerned.

It came to us from the House of Representatives, the splendid framework of a bill; but it required many changes, in our judgment, and ultimately was changed, the total of the amendments made to the bill from the time it was introduced being, I think, 510. It was changed in many of its fundamentals, and before the discussion had ended in the Senate the Secretary of the Treasury, who had originally been opposed to hearings—

That is, hearings in the Senate. Of course, I was speaking about the Senate—was sending over amendment after amendment, asking that they be adopted.

Now, what was there offensive in that? What reflection was there upon the House of Representatives?

I merely said that in the Senate we had insisted upon hearings and had gotten them; that the bill was a splendid structure when it came over here; and that we had made changes. The Senator from Virginia took offense at that.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will permit me—and I will promise hereafter to observe his suggestion——

Mr. REED. It is all right, sir.

Mr. GLASS. That he will not submit to interruption by me in the course of debate—I took no offense at what the Senator has read, as I took no offense at what he originally said. I ventured in response—and it was a venture—to give my view of the matter. I did not flatly, certainly not offensively, contradict the Senator, but I injected into the Senator's remarks a statement which he has not read at all.

Mr. REED. The Senator has been discussing the question of hearings. I think I have very clearly shown by the RECORD that when I was speaking about hearings it was the hearings in the Senate. I made no reference to the hearings in the House. I did not charge that the House held no hearings; I had nothing to do with that; and yet the Senator spent some time on that.

Then the Senator interrupted with this:

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Having had something to do with the banking and currency bill, I desire to assert that there was not a single, solitary hearing had before the Senate committee that was not practically a duplicate of hearings already had by the House on the larger problem of a reform of the banking and currency laws, of the currency, or that was not duplicated by a carefully prepared thesis in the file of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

The Senator suggests that the bill was altered in 500 particulars. So it was, mostly in punctuation points that I do not think ever should have been altered. He said it was altered in many fundamental particulars. I would be greatly obliged to him if he would name one single fundamental particular in which the bill was altered by the Senate that was not changed in conference by the House conferees.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not intend to be diverted from this question to discuss the making of the banking and currency bill. I made an assertion so plainly within the facts that I did not suppose any living human being would have the temerity to challenge that statement. I know that the Senator regards that bill as the child of his brain, and he is unwilling to admit that anybody did anything to improve its condition, either before or after birth.

I intended that merely as a bit of good-natured ribaldry, if you please, nothing else. The Senator further said:

Mr. President——

And again I yielded.

The Senator does not know that, because it is not the fact.

It was a direct challenge of my veracity. I so took it and I so treated it.

Now, what is all this tempest about? I said that I had insisted on hearings on a banking and currency bill in the Senate, and we got those hearings. I say they had given us much light.

I reflected in no way on the House; I complimented it. I did reply, in what I thought would be taken as a jest, in the manner I did. The Senator replied to me in a manner that gentlemen do not regard as quite within the amenities of life, and I made my retort.

The Senator insists that the bill was not changed in the matter of substance. In the course of this debate I mentioned two particulars in which it had been changed. He challenged the correctness of my statement, which he has a right to do. I can not do it to-morrow, because I am leaving town, but I shall take very great pleasure in furnishing a collation of changes that were substantive. The Senator may not think they are; I think they are. So much for that.

As to the personal phase, the Senator says I have no occasion to love him. That is very true; I have not; I do not; but I do not intend to let personal differences control my conduct in the Senate. Any Senator may interrupt me at any time that he wants to, if he will do so, as I will with him.

I am sorry that the time of the Senate has been taken up in this way. I am not concerned about who wrote the banking and currency bill. I am not concerned in how many hearings were had on it. I know that the hearings before the Senate committee brought about many amendments, which were adopted by the Senate after full debate and after we were through with the hearings, and the debate in the Senate also brought many changes. However, all there is to this controversy is that I used that fact as an illustration. On the personal side I care nothing.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not asking the Senator to yield; I thought he had yielded the floor.

Mr. REED. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be a reprint of the pending unfinished business, so as to show in parallel columns the House and the Senate bills. I think it will be very interesting to compare the two, some comparisons having been made which have no foundation whatever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the reprint in parallel columns as requested by the Senator from Nebraska will be made.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 13, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 10, 1921.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, let Thy holy spirit, so vivid, so wondrous, so full of truth, inspire us in the faith that right makes might. So lead us that our aim shall not be to succeed in life but to succeed in living. For this high purpose we beseech Thee take Thy rightful place in our thought and practice. Come to all of our homes and keep them in tune with things divinely beautiful. Where there is grief, where the heart is sore, where the head is sick, give faith and confidence in that power that gives to earth the riches of mother love. Then shall they turn away like happy children playing among the flowers, for they hold a living, glowing truth that shall never fade away. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

On motion of Mr. WINSLOW, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday there was pending an amendment to section 17, which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 12, line 25, after the word "beneficiaries," strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided further, That in case any person who has been dishonorably discharged from the military or naval forces as a result of a court-martial trial, and it is thereafter established to the satisfaction of the President that at the time of the commission of the offense resulting in such court-martial trial and discharge such person was insane, the President may direct and cause to be issued to such person an honorable discharge, and the person receiving such honorable discharge shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of the war risk insurance act.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order, the time for debate having been fixed and having expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late, a vote having been taken on the amendment yesterday, when the point of no quorum was made. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. BLAND of Indiana) there were—ayes 10, noes 15.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I demand tellers.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I withdraw the point of no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the point of order that no quorum is present and demands tellers.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What will be the effect of the point of no quorum now if I make it?

The CHAIRMAN. The only effect will be to compel a call of the House.

Mr. LONDON. Will the vote by tellers be taken after the quorum is developed?

The CHAIRMAN. A vote by tellers can be had if ordered by the committee.

Mr. LONDON. Then I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that we take the vote by tellers first.

Mr. LONDON. I withdraw the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws the point of order, and tellers are demanded.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. WINSLOW and Mr. BLAND of Indiana.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 14.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. Section 31 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended by adding thereto a subsection to be known as subsection (a) and to read as follows:

"(a) Any person who between the 6th day of April, 1917, and the 11th day of November, 1918, applied for enlistment or enrollment in the military or naval forces, and who was accepted provisionally and directed or ordered to a camp, post, station, or other place for final acceptance into such service, shall be considered to be in active service during the period while such person was complying with such order or direction, and during such compliance, and until his final acceptance or rejection for enlistment or enrollment into the military or naval forces, and shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of the war risk insurance act."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 13, beginning in line 13, to strike out the words "and shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 13, line 13, after the word "forces," strike out "and shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion merely pro forma, to call attention to the fact that it will hardly aid the ex-service men in any way to pass a law entitling them to rehabilitation, compensation, and insurance benefits unless after the law is passed it is carried out and they are given those benefits to which they are entitled under the law.

Let me call your attention to a sample of the letters I am getting all the time. I am sure you are getting similar letters. I received this one this morning. It is from Claud E. Smith, who is now in Ward 27–A, Hospital 25, Camp Logan, Houston, Tex., and is dated June 7, 1921. He says that he has been in this hospital nearly six months, suffering from bronchitic pleurisy incurred in the line of duty, that the number of his claim for compensation is C–533914, and he begs me to help him get a hearing on it.

We are receiving letters of this character all the time. Here is a man who claims he has been in the hospital for six months and has made application for the compensation due him and can not hear from it. He can not get a reply until he appeals to a Member of Congress to go down here personally and look after the matter.

The ex-service men, as stated yesterday by my colleague Mr. BLAND of Indiana so forcefully, prepared certain legislation they thought was absolutely necessary in order for these men to get attention and presented such recommendations to this committee. They have not been able to get attention under the present law. It is evident that additional provision must be granted for them to get proper attention. The American Legion, therefore, has made certain suggestions, and has indicated to us that they had confidence in the committee to see that these suggestions would be carried out whereby needed relief would be granted to disabled men. And yet, as was called attention to yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND], and was attempted to be called to our attention by our colleague, Mr. FISH, when he was stopped by a point of order, all their recommendations practically were disregarded, and section 6 as proposed was chopped up. Of course, if we do not expect to pay any attention to their recommendations, well and good, but I am one man who believes if they are not getting the attention to which they are entitled, and men in the service who have made careful investigation and consideration of this subject come before us with proper recommendations, it does occur to me in the line of argument of the gentleman from Indiana that we ought to pay some attention to their recommendations and incorporate same in this bill. If the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND], or the distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. FISH] or our colleague from California [Mr. LINEBERGER]—if any one of them will offer a motion to recommit embracing a proper amendment which will carry out the program of the American Legion, as proposed by the late Col. Galbraith, whose sudden death is a great loss to the American Legion and to the country—I am willing as one Member of Congress to vote to carry out that program and will support a proper motion to recommit.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The suggestion was that we should not limit the number of suboffices, not limit the jurisdiction, that they should have final power in all matters. Is the gentleman in favor of such a provision in this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know what would be best.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is what I thought.

Mr. BLANTON. But I do know that the disabled men have not been given proper attention. I do not believe that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], who just said that, knows any more about it than I do. I do know that Col. Galbraith, as national commander of the American Legion, in behalf of the disabled soldiers, has been giving his time and attention to the subject, has been studying it from every angle, and giving his whole time to it when the time of the gentleman from Indiana has been devoted to many subjects. I do know that when the distinguished commander of the American Legion comes before us with proper suggestions, I am one who believes that we should pay more attention to them and try to carry out his proper recommendations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I desire to inquire what is the purpose of this extensive new amendment. As I take it from a reading of the amendment these men who were provisionally accepted, and subsequently rejected, were not entitled to the provisions of the war risk insurance act. What is the purpose to be accomplished by this provision—to give them standing as if they really had war service?

Mr. SWEET. This section is placed in the bill for the purpose of taking care of men who voluntarily enlisted in the Army or the Navy.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means who attempted to enlist.

Mr. SWEET. Who attempted to enlist, and enlisted provisionally, as the section says.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; who were accepted provisionally, as the section says.

Mr. SWEET. Accepted provisionally. Under section 31 of the act which passed Congress the 24th of December, 1919, we made provision for those who were drafted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Between certain dates.

Mr. SWEET. The language of the law at the present time is as follows:

SEC. 31. That if after induction by the local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, the person died or became disabled as a result of disease contracted or injury suffered in the line of duty and not due to his own willful misconduct involving moral turpitude, or as a result of the aggravation, in the line of duty and not because of his own willful misconduct involving moral turpitude, of an existing disease or injury, he or those entitled thereto shall receive the benefits of compensation payable under Article III: Provided, That any insurance application made by a person after induction by the local draft board but before being accepted and enrolled for active service shall be deemed valid.

Again, in another part of the act, section 12 of that law, we use the following language:

and any person inducted into the service by a local draft board after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who, while in such service, and before being accepted and enrolled for active military or naval service, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each.

That takes care of the men that were drafted.

Mr. STAFFORD. And who received permanent injury while in the service of the Government.

Mr. SWEET. While provisionally in the service of the Government, and it is the intention of this section to place the men who volunteered on the same basis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether he received any permanent injury in the service of the United States or not, but was rejected, and for that reason the Government intends to give him the full benefit of the compensation act.

Mr. SWEET. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, if I am mistaken I wish to be corrected.

Mr. SWEET. A careful reading of the section will disclose that we have taken care of the matter——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman be kind enough to point that out? I have read this quite carefully. The provision under consideration provides that any person who between the 6th day of April, 1917, and the 11th day of November, 1918, applied for enlistment or enrollment in the military or naval forces, and who was accepted provisionally and directed or ordered to a camp, post, station, or other place for final acceptance into the service, shall be considered to be in active service and entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of the war risk insurance act. My point is this: Take the concrete case of some person being accepted provisionally who has an inherent physical defect; for instance, tubercular trouble. The examining surgeon at that post, we will say, rejected him for service, yet he will, by reason of some disease or disability contracted before his enlistment, receive the full benefits of the compensation law under this provision as I construe it. If it is the purpose to do that, that is one thing; and if it is not, it is another thing.

Mr. SWEET. Let me read the section carefully to the gentleman:

(a) Any person who between the 6th day of April, 1917, and the 11th day of November, 1918, applied for enlistment or enrollment in the military or naval forces, and who was accepted provisionally and directed or ordered to a camp, post, station, or other place for final acceptance into such service, shall be considered to be in active service during the period while such person was complying with such order or direction, and during such compliance, and until his final acceptance or rejection for enlistment or enrollment into the military or naval forces, and shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of the war risk insurance act.

That whole paragraph turns upon the proposition—while such person was complying with such order or direction.

If he is doing anything else, if he is not complying with orders, then in that event he is not entitled to the benefit. Whatever injury may come to him, whatever disability may come to him must come to him during the period when he is complying with the orders.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. In case a recruiting officer should go into a town getting recruits and should recruit men among whom there might be a young man affected with tuberculosis the recruit would sign the recruiting roll and he would be afterwards ordered to a military post for examination which would follow. The point I would have the gentleman make very plain is this: Is this intended only to cover injuries resulting from carrying out the order issued by the recruiting officer to get this man inducted into the service, or would it cover a case where a man was affected with tuberculosis, which fact was not discovered by the recruiting officer, but was afterwards discovered by the Army surgeon when he was to be mustered into the service permanently?

Mr. SWEET. This covers only the period while the man is carrying out the order—for the disability that he received while carrying out the order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the statement that it is only for disability incurred while carrying out the order?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Suppose a man during this period specified in the section should lose both legs as the result of falling under a train while drunk, the injury being received clearly outside of the line of duty and not of service origin. My theory about the section is what is contained in the last few lines, to the effect that such a man shall, without qualification, be entitled to compensation and insurance benefits of the war risk insurance act. I wondered if the gentleman from Iowa would approve of the insertion after the word "and" of the words "if otherwise eligible"? That would require that the injury should be of service origin, and that the provisions of the law in general should be complied with before the man should receive compensation or insurance.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. When it provides that the man shall be entitled to compensation and insurance benefits of the war risk insurance act, certainly that does not mean that he shall have those benefits regardless of the conditions of the act, but he comes in under the terms of the act as anyone else would.

Mr. STAFFORD. But there is another provision in the act which holds that when a man enters the service he is to be presumed to be in good health, and, regardless of his rejection by reason of physical disability prior to his entrance into the service, he is entitled to the benefits of the compensation act under the language of the provision.

Mr. HOCH. This simply applies to the war risk insurance act. I do not see how this applies in any sense other than under the general provisions of the war risk insurance act.

Mr. STAFFORD. No. It brings him under the general provisions of the act, and one of those provisions is that when he is accepted into the service he shall be considered as being physically sound, even though rejected later.

Mr. HOCH. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is another provision of the act that provides that.

Mr. HOCH. It says that he shall be entitled to compensation and insurance benefits of the act. Whatever the limitations or the conditions of the act are, they apply to this man.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that the language should be "under the act."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. This section was very thoroughly discussed by the committee, and I think I can tell the gentleman exactly what he asks. The section provides that a man shall be considered to be in actual service, and so forth, and we followed that up by this sort of a case. Some young gentlemen volunteered to join the Navy. They were examined and enrolled for service, but they were not yet ready to call them to the camps. They were told to go back home. The train on which they were traveling was wrecked as they were going back home under the orders of the enrolling officer. This would exactly cover a case like that, and this provides that those men were killed or injured in line of duty while acting under the order of the enrolling officer.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am in hearty sympathy with the idea of making provision for that kind of a case, but I fear the phraseology here is so broad that it will cover other cases.

Mr. RAYBURN. Just what?

Mr. STAFFORD. Such a case as that suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] of a man enlisting who is suffering from tubercular trouble, who is rejected after examination by the medical officer of the post. He would be entitled to all of the benefits of the war risk insurance act under the wording of this provision.

Mr. RAYBURN. During the time that this man is acting under the orders of the enrollment officer, if it be one day or two days or a week, he will be considered in active service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] if it was not the purpose of the committee to require a man enlisted provisionally to prove conclusively that the injury under which he would get this compensation was the result of some order or of his service while in such provisional capacity.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think so.

Mr. McKENZIE. And that if he could not establish that fact he could not come under the provisions of this act?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that is true.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is pretty broad, however, I think.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think that if the word "of," the last word in line 14, were changed to the word "under," it would remove the doubt which the gentleman has in his mind?

Mr. STAFFORD. It would go a long ways to remove it, and I think either that or the amendment suggested by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. ROGERS] would cure the objection I have.

Mr. WALSH. That word implies that it must come within all the requirements of the act rather than just be entitled to certain benefits of the act.

Mr. RAYBURN. As far as I am concerned, that amendment would not be disagreeable to me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment and offer a preferential amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I object; it is not a pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. It was offered merely as a pro forma amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not do that.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin still has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 14, the word "of" and insert the word "under."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 14, after the word "benefits," strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "under."

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I make no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in three minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I have an amendment to offer as a new section following this. The motion would not cover the new section?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; it would.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is wholly a new section.

Mr. WINSLOW. It is no part of this section.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is not part of this section, but it comes in as an entirely new section, and my parliamentary inquiry is—I have an amendment as a new section following this section—Would the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts cover such an amendment? I do not think it would.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the precedents heretofore are to the effect that a motion to close debate upon a section of the bill would also close debate upon a new section as an amendment to that section.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It would not necessarily be an amendment.

Mr. WINSLOW. I do not understand the gentleman proposes to amend this section, but he has a new one and matter altogether different.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to say that while the precedents were as he stated, the Chair thinks the precedent is not logical, and the Chair would not hold in accordance with the precedent if the amendment were offered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 13, after the word "and," by inserting the words "if otherwise eligible."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 13, line 13, after the word "and," insert "if otherwise eligible."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Would it not be preferable to say "otherwise entitled to the benefits of the act"? The word "eligible" hardly expresses what the gentleman has in his mind.

Mr. ROGERS. I am not scrupulous about the language, but I think "if otherwise eligible" conveys the idea that the man must be eligible under the law. I do not see what else it can mean. My point is simply to make sure that a man provisionally accepted shall not have higher rights under the war risk insurance law than a man who fought all through the war and who is injured in line of duty. A man who gets drunk and is injured, not in line of duty, might under this language as it stands in the bill be construed to have the benefits of compensation and insurance. I think there can not be any objection to making it perfectly clear that the man must be otherwise eligible in order to get these benefits. Therefore I hope these words may be added.

Mr. SWEET. I have no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, after line 15, insert a new section, as follows: That that part of the second sentence of section 401 of the war risk insurance act as amended in section 12 of "An act to amend and modify the war risk insurance act," approved December 24, 1919, which reads as follows:

"Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who, while in such service, and before the expiration of 120 days after October 15, 1917, or 120 days after entrance into or employment in the active service, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who, while in such service, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the proposed amendment is not germane to this section, that it is not in order as an amendment to this part of the bill. This part of the bill pertains to Title II of the war risk insurance act, and the amendment proposes to amend a section pertaining to Title IV, which is taken up in this bill several pages subsequent to this.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, I claim that my amendment, which refers to automatic insurance and extends the scope of automatic insurance, as does the section we have just read, when offered at this place is germane to the subject matter of the section under consideration. Secondly, I claim that it is germane to all of Title II of the bill, because there are something like seven or eight amendments under this title that deal with war risk insurance, and the Chair is well acquainted with the rule that, for instance, a bill granting relief to two or more persons, an amendment to extend relief to others is in order, or in a bill for the admission of more than one State amendments admitting a State or States other than named in the bill are in order. In the third place, Mr. Chairman, I lay down the broad proposition here that as Title II contains numerous amendments to the war risk insurance act, that any amendment to any section of the war risk insurance act pertaining to relief to soldiers is in order under this Title II of the bill under consideration.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I can not yield now. Let me cite to the Chair a few authorities along that line, if the Chair will indulge me for just a few minutes. I call the Chair's attention to the rulings in Volume V, Hinds' Precedents, sections 5823 and 5824. Under section 5823 there was a bill before the House for the codification of postal laws. It was considered in the Committee of the Whole. There was under consideration a section authorizing positions and salaries for a superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, a chief clerk, and certain division superintendents and assistant division superintendents in the same service.

To this Mr. James A. Tawney, of Minnesota, offered an amendment striking out the section as read and inserting a comprehensive scheme of classification for the Railway Mail Service, dealing not only with the superintendent and his assistants but with all the personnel of the service.

Mr. Eugene F. Loud, of California, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane to the section under consideration, although he admitted that it was germane to the bill.

Here is the opinion of Maj. Lacey, of Iowa, who was in the chair at the time:

This is one of the embarrassments in the consideration of a codification bill. It covers very much territory. It is germane to the bill and in some degree germane to the section also, as well as to other sections of the bill.

As it is in this case, because the section which we just passed extends the scope of automatic insurance and the new section that I offer extends the scope of automatic insurance. The section we have just passed extends the scope of automatic insurance so as to include those who were provisionally accepted, and if between the time of their provisional acceptance and the time when they were probably notified they could not be taken something happened to them, they come within the scope of this section. The amendment I offer extends the scope of automatic insurance, so that all persons who either died or were permanently and totally disabled between February 12, 1918, and November 11, 1918, and who were not covered by contract insurance, get the benefits of automatic insurance.

As well as to other sections of the bill—

Now, there are seven or eight sections of this bill dealing with insurance.

Reading again from Mr. Lacey's ruling:

The gentleman offering the amendment, the Chair thinks, would have the privilege of attaching it to any one of the particular sections to which it is in part germane, and would then have an opportunity—

And so forth.

Now, then, I call the Chair's attention to 5824. I do not remember that this ruling referred to in this precedent has ever been argued during the time I have been in Congress, the last six years. In section 5824 the subject matter was a bill before the House of Representatives amending certain sections of the bankruptcy act. It says:

On June 17, 1902, the House was considering the bill (H. R. 13679) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, when Mr. David A. De Armond, of Missouri, offered the following amendment:

The amendment offered was to repeal every section of the bankruptcy act. That was the substance of it. I shall not read the amendment.

Mr. George W. Ray, of New York, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane.

After debate the Speaker pro tempore ruled:

The bill before the House is a bill "to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898."

The bill before the House now is an act to amend the war risk insurance law.

To that bill the gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment. * * * To this proposed amendment the point is made that it is not germane.

I shall not read the entire opinion. The Speaker pro tempore goes on to say, in the paragraph succeeding, that the proposition is a new one.

It is apparent from even a casual examination of the bill that it is a general amendatory bill.

As this is.

Section 1 relates to clause 15 of section 1.

And it goes on and refers to different sections of the bill before the House.

In this bill which is now before the House there are 15 amendments to the war risk insurance act. I jump a few paragraphs:

Substantially the same principle was recognized by Speaker Henderson in a case where amendments were offered of a general character to the Senate joint resolution providing for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 24, 1900.

Then he calls attention to the rule that provides that where there is a bill to amend a specific portion of an act, amendments to other portions of the act are not in order; that where the bill before the House is for the relief of one individual, an amendment can not be offered including other individuals, or in bills to admit one State into the Union there can not be offered amendments to admit others. But if the bill before the House is for granting relief to two or more individuals it can be amended by adding others; and the same way about a bill admitting two or more States into the Union, an amendment admitting another State or other States is in order.

It needs no argument to show that it would be competent to amend the pending bill, disposing of it section by section. For example, section 1 may be amended by striking out the words "amended so as to read as follows," and by substituting the word "repealed," so that the section would read: "That clause 15 of section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898, be, and the same is hereby repealed."

The same method may be followed in the case of each and all of the sections of the bill in their order. And this process, in the opinion of the Chair, may be made to reach to other paragraphs of the bankruptcy law than those specifically referred to in the pending amendatory bill, because all the sections of the bankruptcy law are germane to each other.

I want the Chair to get that sentence, and I repeat it:

And this process, in the opinion of the Chair, may be made to reach to other paragraphs of the bankruptcy law than those specifically referred to in the pending amendatory bill, because all the sections of the bankruptcy law are germane to each other.

For example, it would be in order to amend the bill by adding additional sections amendatory of sections of the bankruptcy law not referred to in the bill.

If this be so, then it would be equally in order to amend the bill by adding additional sections repealing sections of the bankruptcy law not referred to in this bill. If this process of reasoning be correct, then it is clear that by resort to the methods suggested the entire bankruptcy law may be repealed by indirection. As it is, one of the purposes of parliamentary rules is to provide for the most direct method of disposing of legislation, and as by the process described the effect intended by this amendment can be reached, the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment must be germane, and therefore overrules the point of order.

This is the end of the ruling. I claim these rulings are clearly in point and sustain my contention. Mr. Chairman, that is all I care to say on the point of order, and now I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will wait until the gentleman yields the floor.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then I will yield the floor.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to speak but about two minutes on the point of order. It seems to me that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] is clearly right in his point of order, which was that this amendment is not germane as a new section at this place in the bill. The rule is laid down in Hinds' 5822. It is a very familiar rule, that an amendment inserting an additional section should be germane to the portion of the bill to which it is offered.

The Bureau of War Risk law is divided into a number of titles. The first title is numbered up to 100. The second title begins with 200 and runs to 300. The third title begins with 300 and runs to 400. Title IV begins with 400 and deals with insurance and insurance alone. You can always tell where it is located, because the number will be four hundred and something. The gentleman's amendment amends section 401. I do not care to discuss the question whether his amendment would be germane when we reach that portion of the bill where the bill amends sections under Title IV.

The CHAIRMAN. It is true that the war risk insurance act is divided into several items. The first of these items, however, relates to general definitions applicable to the entire bill. They are not confined to either allotments, compensation, or insurance; as, for instance, paragraph 31, to which the section of the bill under consideration is proposed to be added as a subsection, contains a proviso in this language:

Provided, That any insurance application made by a person after induction by the local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, shall be deemed valid.

That proviso in the very section which this section proposed by the committee seeks to amend deals directly with insurance. Does the gentleman contend that this provision is not germane to the provision in the act?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; and I do for this reason, and I hope the Chair will notice the provisions of the amendment specifically in connection with this point: If the amendment proposed by the gentleman were in general language, dealing with that subject, it might be in order. But the gentleman's amendment is a specific amendment to the second sentence of section 401 of the original act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. And if that should be adopted, then an amendment to section 401 would constitute part of section 31, which is incorporated in the second paragraph?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. The reason for the rule, if the Chair please, grows out of the rule of orderly procedure in legislation. This amendment is a specific amendment to the second sentence in section 401, and if the gentleman will wait until we deal with that—and we do in this bill, commencing with section 22, where we commence dealing with the fourth title of the bill—if the gentleman will wait until we reach that section and offer his amendment there, certainly there will be no technical objection to its being offered at that place. Otherwise the Chair will note what would happen to the bill. We would have this amendment to section 401 put back in the first title. Then we would have section 401 put in the other title. The sole purpose of the rule, if the Chair please, is to have orderly arrangement of legislation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman's argument is that the gentleman's amendment is not germane at this place. Does he admit that it would be germane after we get over to the sections following 400?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not admit that it would be germane. We have not reached that point, and I do not know what might be presented by some other gentleman on the subject that would change my mind. I am inclined personally to think that when we reach the fourth title of this bill, because we bring in many sections by amendment, and these amendments are to sections which deal with the substance of the subject matter of the bill, the gentleman's amendment would be germane to the other sections. If we deal with only one section of the title, I do not think it would be.

The CHAIRMAN. The war risk insurance act, as the Chair has already stated, is divided into four titles. The first of those titles deals with provisions that are more or less general to the entire act, definitions and general provisions of that sort. The second title relates to allotments. The third title relates to compensation, and the fourth relates to insurance. The general rule applicable to amendments provides that an amendment must be germane not only to the bill but to the section. If it is offered to a section, or, if offered as a new section, it must be germane in the place where it is offered.

The provision under consideration amends but one section of the first title of the war risk insurance act. It amends no other section of that title. The Chair feels that the purpose of the rule requiring that an amendment shall be germane at the place in which it is offered is to preserve the proper order of the legislation, and that to permit the introduction of an amendment to a portion of the bill under Title IV as an amendment to a section in Title I, for instance, of this bill, would be to destroy the orderly sequence of the legislation. The Chair is not now holding that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa is not germane to the bill, but under the rules of the House the Chair does not think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa is germane to the section to which it is offered as an amendment, or as a new section in the place in which it is offered, and therefore sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

SEC. 17. Section 210 of the war risk insurance act as amended is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 210. Upon receipt of any application for family allowance, the director shall make all proper investigations and shall make an award, on the basis of which award the amount of the allotments to be made by the man shall be certified to the War Department or Navy Department, as may be proper. Whenever the director shall have reason to believe that an allowance has been improperly made or that the conditions have changed, he shall investigate or reinvestigate and may modify the award. The amount of each monthly allotment and allowance shall be determined according to the family conditions existing on the first day of the month: Provided, That whenever an award of allotment or allowance, or both, covering any period has been paid to, or on behalf of, a person designated by the enlisted man as beneficiary of his allotment, no recovery of the allotments paid in such cases shall hereafter be made for any reason whatsoever; and no recovery of the allowances paid in such cases shall hereafter be made for any reason whatsoever except where it is shown that the person receiving the allowance does not bear the relationship to the enlisted man which is required by the war risk insurance act, and except, also, in cases of manifest fraud."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 14, after the word "fraud" on line 14, strike out the period, insert a colon and add the following: "Provided further, That whenever an application for family allowance has been, or shall hereafter be, presented to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance by or on behalf of any person within class A, and it shall after due investigation be determined that the necessary relationship existed between such person and an enlisted man in the active military or naval service at the time when the application was made, and that compulsory allotment has not been waived or exemption therefrom granted, a family allowance shall be awarded and paid for the full period defined in section 204 hereof or for such part of said period as it shall be shown that the relationship existed, notwithstanding the fact that no deductions from the pay of the enlisted man for compulsory allotment in favor of such person have been made, and notwithstanding the further fact that the enlisted man has been discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States. Any awards heretofore made which are inconsistent with the provisions of this section may upon application be reopened and made to conform herewith."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think the amendment is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey will state his point of order.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. This is my point of order: This particular section is an amendment. It is governed by the rules which govern other amendments, and an amendment to an amendment must be germane to the amendment. I desire to point out that this particular amendment is not the substitution of a new section for an old one. It does not say that the old section is repealed and another one put in its place. It says that section 210 as amended is amended to read as follows. And when you look at the old law you will see that it is only amended by the addition of the proviso that there shall be no recovery of moneys already paid under an award. That is the only amendment in it, and it might just as well be expressed in the following words:

Be it enacted that section 210 of the war risk insurance act as amended is hereby amended by adding a proviso so as to read as follows.

And the proviso is the only thing that is put in. Now, when we amend that amendment we must stick to the amendment that is made. We can not put another amendment on top of it. It must come afterward if at all, and it seems to me that the gentleman's amendment which has been read relates entirely to the investigations and the awards, and to the first part or old section and not to the last part. The amendment before the House is the amendment to that particular section by adding a proviso to it which presents the return of certain moneys, and that has to be carried as a separate thing from provisions as to the awards, which have nothing to do with this proviso.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, of course the Chair is familiar with clause 7 of Rule XVI, which limits the right to amend a section in the pending bill by offering an amendment which is germane to the subject matter. Now, what is the subject matter of section 210 in the bill? It relates to the payment of family allotments and allowances, and first authorizes the director to make investigation in cases where the soldier has made an allotment and after such investigation to make an award of a Government allowance. That is the first thing it does.

The second thing it does is to authorize the director to investigate and reinvestigate allowances which have been made, and upon the facts ascertained by such investigation or reinvestigation to change, modify, or altogether annul the award that has been made. The proviso which is added to section 210 limits the right of the director to collect back for the benefit of the Government allotments which have been paid to certain designated beneficiaries. It says that where such allotments have been paid to the beneficiary designated by the soldier the allotments shall not be collected back, and also that the allowances shall only be collected back in cases where the relationship was misstated or fraud was practiced upon the Government. The purpose of my amendment is to cover an additional class of cases. There are some cases where through neglect of the husband or on account of the neglect of the Government or on account of the neglect of both no checkage was ever made against the pay of the soldier, and therefore no allowance was paid to the wife or the children, although it was the compulsory duty of the Government to do so. There were a number of these cases, perhaps not very numerous, where the soldier remained in the service several months, in some cases as long as a year, and was discharged without any allotment having been checked against his pay, and as a result of that neglect the wife and children received no allowance whatever.

The director of the bureau was unable to pay any allowance after the soldier was dismissed from the service, although he recognized the full extent of the equity of the wife and children to receive it for the length of term the soldier was in the Army. The purpose of this amendment is to authorize the director to reopen these cases and to pay the Government allowance, notwithstanding there was no checkage against the soldier's pay. Of course, in cases where there had been a waiver of the allotment, or where there had been an exemption granted, the director would not have to pay such allowance. I submit that inasmuch as the general subject of section 210 relating to allotments and allowances is the question under consideration the amendment would not be subject to a point of order because it relates to the same subject matter and in a proper way under the rules of the House.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I understand that many Members did not hear my point of order on account of the confusion. The point I make is that this section of this bill is itself an amendment. All that it does is to add a proviso to the original section. It is an amendment which says that the original section shall be amended by adding such a proviso, and, therefore, any amendment before the adoption of this amendment must be germane to that amendment—that is, to the proviso. An amendment can not be offered to the section itself. It is not amended except by adding a proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is quite willing to confess that he has had a good deal of difficulty in arriving at a general conclusion with respect to the extent to which the proposed bill opens up the war risk insurance act for amendment offered from the floor. The section under consideration amends section 210 of the war risk act, which section deals with the administration of family allowances. The Chair thinks it would be rather an arbitrary ruling to hold that where the committee has reported an amendment to a section in a law no amendment can be considered to that section except an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee. The Chair is of the opinion that where the committee proposes an amendment to a section of the law in the nature of a substitute an amendment which is germane to that section of the law and the amendment of the committee is in order. The Chair thinks that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is germane to the section of the law under consideration and the amendment proposed by the committee, and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I really do not think that when Members stop to consider the provisions of the amendment which I have offered there will be any objection to it, because the identical provision has passed the House twice. It was enacted in the original Sweet bill, passed in 1919, but was omitted when the bill was reported by the Senate, and in the conference between the two Houses it was not agreed to, and so did not become a law. The same provision was reenacted in what is known as the Wason bill at the last session of Congress, but, as we all recall, the Wason bill did not become a law.

Now, what is the situation covered by my amendment? There were two classes of allotment—one was class A, which was compulsory, and the other was class B, which was voluntary. In class A allotments the Government was also compelled to make Government allowance, unless there was a waiver or an exemption was granted. The class A allotments were those paid to soldiers' wives and children. Class B allotments were those paid to parents or other dependents and were voluntary.

Now, there were some cases which resulted in this way: The soldier neglected, either willfully or inadvertently, to make any statement as to his married status, and there were other cases where he did make it, but the Government through oversight or neglect failed to make any checkage against his pay. The Government allotment and allowances were never paid to the wife and children. One such case in my own district was brought to my attention. The soldier was drafted into the service in July, 1918. At that time he was an unmarried man, and so stated on his enlistment blank. In August, 1918, a month later, he was married, and soon after was sent to France. Before going to France he did make an application for an allotment or allowance for his wife, so he claims. His wife waited two or three months, and not receiving any pay from the Government, in December, 1918, she called the matter to my attention by letter. I procured the proper blanks to enable the wife to make application for allotment and allowance and sent them to her. She executed the blanks, furnished the marriage certificate, and I filed them with the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. The director immediately started a line of correspondence with the military authorities in France in an attempt to get a checkage against the man's pay. The correspondence went on from time to time, but somehow the soldier was never located until finally, in May, 1919, he was discharged from the service without any checkage ever having been made against his pay.

Therefore, for the whole 10 months his wife received no Government allowance, although she was just as equitably entitled to it as any case I can think of. Her circumstances were poor, and the failure to receive this allotment and allowance worked a real hardship.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Did the soldier himself order any part of his pay sent to his wife as an allotment?

Mr. BLACK. That was the claim he made to his wife.

Mr. BEGG. Do his pay vouchers show that it was so made?

Mr. BLACK. There was no deduction made. If he did in fact make an allotment, it was lost somewhere in the shuffle. No deduction was ever made. He was discharged without its having been made, and as a result his wife never did collect a cent allowance, although she made application for it five months prior to the soldier's discharge from the service. I shall refer to another class of cases which present just as meritorious a claim. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] had a case in his district where the husband had a quarrel with his wife before he went into the service. He left a wife and four children at home. He failed to disclose the relationship. He was sent across the sea. The wife filed her application for the allotment and allowance for herself and children, as she had a right to do, as it was her duty to do. The matter was pending, just like the case I mentioned, for several months. The director endeavored to get in touch with the military authorities, and finally the soldier was discharged without any checkage having been made against his pay, and the wife and four children received no allowance whatever from the Government. Can any gentleman point out to me any reason whatever why in either one of these cases the wife should not be paid this Government allowance? When the amendment was originally offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] it covered the payment of the soldier's allotment, as well as the allowance. At that time I offered an amendment to strike out the allotment part of it, because I did not believe the Government ought to have to pay the allotment which the soldier had already collected. My amendment was adopted at the time it was proposed. The Secretary of the Treasury made a favorable recommendation on this when it was before the House in the original Sweet bill.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In a moment. With your permission, I shall read the letter from Mr. GLASS, which was addressed to Mr. TREADWAY:

As to general amendment to the war risk insurance act to cover Beaudry and similar cases.

Responding to your request, by telephone, that I inform you respecting my views as to the advisability of an amendment to the war risk insurance act which would give relief in all cases similar to that above noted, allow me to say:

1. That in my judgment such an amendment would afford relief to many worthy persons whose claims to allotment and allowance lack merit in law only and not in fact, and hence is desirable as a matter of justice.

2. That while H. R. 8074 is appropriate in a measure to accomplish the result above indicated as being desirable, yet it is not entirely so, nor in some respects is it aptly worded; and that if you so desire I shall take pleasure in having drawn and in submitting to you an amendment, such as in my judgment would more adequately and appropriately meet the situation.

The amendment which the Secretary did draw was the Treadway amendment, which I have just referred to. We amended that amendment when it was before the House the other time by striking out the obligation on the part of the Government to pay the allotment and left only the allowance to be paid.

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In a moment. I can see where there could be a valid objection to paying the wife and children the $15 a month that was not checked against the soldier's pay and so I offered an amendment to strike that out. What I claim we ought to pay is the Government monthly allowance to which the wife and children were justly entitled. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOWLING. I wanted to ask the gentleman if his proposed amendment furnishes any safeguard to the Government against fraudulent claims that might be made to reach the end that he has in view—the payment of this compensation?

Mr. BLACK. It specifically provides that where the soldier has been granted an exemption from the payment of this allotment that no allowance shall be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. I want to finish answering the inquiry. The amendment also provides that where a waiver has been executed no allowance can be paid. It covers only those cases where either through the soldier's willful neglect or inadvertence he failed to disclose the relationship, or in cases where he did disclose it and the Government through neglect never paid the allowance.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Could the gentleman inform us what probable number of cases his amendment would cover, and give us an estimate as to the cost to the Government if it should become a law?

Mr. BLACK. I can only read the letter from the Treasury Department to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and that does not give the exact number. I should not think it would be very considerable, although there are quite a few cases of that sort. I read the letter of Mr. Hallett, acting director at that time.

MY DEAR MR. TREADWAY: I am forwarding to you herewith a draft of a proposed amendment to H. R. 8778 to take the place of a typewritten amendment which, I understand, was drafted by Mr. SWEET and submitted to the Treasury Department this morning. The draft submitted is intended to accomplish the same purpose but is believed to meet the situation more adequately and definitely. It is very broad in its terms and imposes a liability upon the United States which is much broader than that imposed by the war risk insurance act as it has been interpreted in the past by the bureau. It is not broader than it should be in order to do justice in such cases as the Beaudry case and others of a similar nature.

Very truly, yours, R. H. HALLETT.

I was under the impression that Mr. Hallett stated something about the number of cases in that letter, but I find that he does not. In my discussion with the War Risk Insurance Bureau I found there are quite a number of such cases.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize that there are many cases, specific and special cases, growing out of the war that are probably needing attention, but from a hasty reading of this amendment and after listening to it as carefully as I could, it seems to me that we are taking a long chance to help one or two specific cases in opening an avenue that can be abused.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state how it can be abused?

Mr. BEGG. I shall try to before I get through. I certainly am not one who would deprive the wife and children of any soldier of whatever allowance they were entitled to during the service of the soldier. On the other hand, if the soldier himself, if the husband, was negligent to the point that he did not see to it that a part of his salary was taken out, it shows on the face of it, at least, that he was willing to get more for his monthly pay than that to which he was justly entitled.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I only have five minutes, and I would rather not yield at this time. I will probably yield to the gentleman in just a minute. Now, if this soldier or this class of men who are affected by this amendment had called the officers' attention to the fact that there was no deduction out of their pay for this month or any other month, and that they had made an allotment to their families, then I would say that that soldier would have a just right to come in and make a claim at this time against the Government for an allotment to his family. I will say to the committee we found a number of them last year in the committee investigating the War Risk Bureau. We found a great number of cases where they were claiming an allotment should have been made to a family, yet they were perfectly willing to continue drawing their full month's pay in face of the fact they knew they had made a partial allotment to the members of their immediate family.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I want to be fair with every soldier, but I do not want to give them an opportunity to take advantage of an amendment that will open up the doors. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PARRISH. I see some merit in the suggestion of the gentleman, but I do not agree with his conclusion. What would it be in the case the husband did not want to make an allotment and did not protect his wife and children?

Mr. BEGG. Well, in reply to that, I will say we have had a number make their application through the regular channels, and if it were shown they were entitled to the allotment they would get the pay.

Mr. PARRISH. But without this amendment they could not get it.

Mr. BEGG. But I want to call attention on this proposition: You are legislating a piece of general legislation that calls for a specific instance; there may be one, two, or three, or a half dozen, but you are writing a provision in here which may open up the avenue to thousands of men who never had any intention of making an allotment—you are writing a piece of general legislation in here without thorough committee consideration, and you are asking this committee to pass upon this great long amendment, and I know no man can analyze and realize what is in it by reading and discussing it a minute or two.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I will.

Mr. BLACK. I want to ask the gentleman what his views are in this case: The case where a soldier did not execute his allotment but the wife executed an application for it, which she had the right to do under the war risk insurance act, and through neglect of the Government in Washington it was never checked against the man's pay, and therefore she never did receive any allowance?

Mr. BEGG. I want to ask the gentleman, has he been able in this specific case to establish beyond question of doubt that the wife did do that?

Mr. BLACK. Oh, yes; I filed her application here in Washington.

Mr. BEGG. Why was there no checkage?

Mr. BLACK. Because the soldier was overseas and drew his pay, and they had correspondence going all over France, unable to find him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. I ask for one minute to reply to this. So far as I am concerned, and I will say again time does not allow a study of the proposition, there are other laws which provide a medium through which they could get the allotment.

Mr. BLACK. But they do not get it.

Mr. BEGG. In this specific case the gentleman has in mind, complying with the law he could make application and it does not need legislation to get the allotment, because she was justly entitled to it.

Mr. BLACK. No; there is a decision of the comptroller to the effect that where the soldier has been discharged from the service then he can not pay a cent of Government allowance.

Mr. BEGG. In other words, can not pay what is due?

Mr. BLACK. Not a cent of it.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I shall make a brief explanation relative to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas. The amendment that the gentleman proposes, as stated by him, was in what is known as the Sweet bill, which passed the House on the 13th of September, 1919. It was stricken out in the Senate. This same amendment was placed in what was known as the Wason bill, and passed both the House and the Senate; and, as we all know, the President failed to sign the bill. This amendment is proposed for the purpose of taking care of a case where a young man went into the service, and at the time he entered the service he stated he was a single man when, in fact, he was married. During the time that he was in the service he drew his full pay. He made no allotment. Afterwards the wife made application for allotment and allowance. In many instances it took considerable time to pass upon her application. In many instances the young man was out of the service before it was determined. This amendment proposes to allow these cases to be opened up, and that the Government pay the amount of the allowance that the wife would be entitled to from the date of her application until the young man went out of the service. It has no reference whatever to the question of allotment. It is simply a payment of the allowance to which she would have been entitled if the truth had been stated from the inception of the young man's going into the service. Now, the Allotment and Allowance Division of the War Risk Insurance Bureau will soon come to an end. Under a resolution passed by the Congress at the last session the Allotment and Allowance Division will technically come to an end on the 3d day of July, but according to a construction placed upon the war risk insurance act it has been decided that it will end on the 31st day of July. Now, the question naturally arises, If we allow this amendment to be adopted, will it delay the settlement of all matters in connection with allowances and allotments?

I must say to the House that the equities of this amendment appeal to me and I believe to many Members of the House, that the wife should really be entitled to the allowance she would have received if the young man had made proper representations to the Government when he entered the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] has expired.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. This proviso relates to the recovery of allotments and allowances?

Mr. SWEET. It relates to the recovery of allowances.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I want to ask if either this proviso or the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] would have any application to such cases as these? For instance, there were men in the service who made allotments; they were killed overseas or otherwise separated from the service, but because of some defect in the records here in the War Department the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was not notified of the separation of the men from the service and went on paying to a mother or to a wife the original allotment and allowances based on it. Later, when it learned the fact that a man had been separated from the service, it has sought to recover from the beneficiary the amounts paid subsequent to the date of the separation of the man from the service. Now, in most of those cases—take the case of the mother, for instance, and she has accepted that money in good faith, she has spent it, and she is unable to meet the demands of the Government for reimbursement. Now, does this proviso or this amendment affect those cases in any way?

Mr. SWEET. The amendment does not affect those cases in any way, but a provision in the bill takes care of them.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Now, the only thing that bothers me about it is this: It refers to allotments. I take it that an allotment is a portion of a man's legal pay diverted from him to another person. Now, when that man was separated from the service there was no pay due him, and there could not be technically an allotment from pay that was not due him. I want to know if you have technically met the situation? Is this designed to do that?

Mr. SWEET. This section is a general clean-up section, so that the Division of Allotments and Allowances can be wound up and ended.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Of course, technically, when there was no pay due a man there could not be said to be any allotments from that pay, and yet they went on paying to the mother and the widow, as I have mentioned, unauthorized amounts of money.

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Does this prevent a recovery in those cases, or may the department go on and recover?

Mr. SWEET. As I view it, it prevents a recovery.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is at the present time in the gallery of this House a young American soldier who was commissioned as captain prior to the time that he retired to civil life. This young man is Oklahoma's only flying ace. He had the distinction of bringing down seven German airplanes during the war. I think while we are considering a bill that has for its purpose the bringing about of certain relief to the soldiers it is proper to call the attention of this House to one of the most trying experiences that ever confronted any person in the Air Service.

This young soldier one morning was called out to act as a patrol for the photographers and map makers. After the work had been completed he found he had a sufficient amount of gas to keep him in the air for an hour, and so he decided to do a little reconnoitering on his own hook. He began to climb, and after he had reached a high altitude over the German lines suddenly he saw an allied plane being closely pursued by 13 German airplanes in flying formation. He darted down out of the clouds and attacked the leader, and in a few minutes that leader and his machine were sent hurling to the ground; then the 12 remaining German planes turned their fire on him. Singlehanded he fought those 12 German airplanes until his machine was completely riddled with bullets; until his ammunition was exhausted; and then realizing that unless some extraordinary move was made he would be brought face to face with sudden death he turned his airplane into a tail spin and fell 2½ miles, creating the impression that he had been shot down; but just before he reached the top of the trees he glided into safety back of the American line, thereby saving the allied flyer and himself. [Applause.]

This young flyer has been given four croix de guerre medals; he has the distinguished service cross medal; he has the French shoulder-brace cord, known as the fouragere decoration; and the Lafayette medal. He comes from the farm. He is one of the few men who have reached maturity who can truthfully say he was born in the State of Oklahoma.

I say I think it is very fitting that his most remarkable record should be brought to the attention of the House. And so I wish to call attention to the fact that there, sitting in the front seat of the gallery, is Capt. Will Ponder, of Mangum, Okla., who nobly did his duty for his country. [Loud applause, the Members rising.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLACK. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 63.

Mr. BLACK. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. BLACK and Mr. SANDERS of Indiana to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. Section 300 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 300. For death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the line of duty on or after April 6, 1917, or for an aggravation of a disability existing prior to examination, acceptance, and enrollment for service, when such aggravation was suffered and contracted in the line of duty on or after April 6, 1917, by any commissioned officer or enlisted man, or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in the active service under the War Department or Navy Department, the United States shall pay to such commissioned officer or enlisted man, member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) or, in the discretion of the director, separately to his or her dependents, compensation as hereinafter provided; but no compensation shall be paid if the injury, disease, or aggravation has been cause by his own willful misconduct: Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or other member employed in the active service under the War Department or Navy Department on or before November 11, 1918, heretofore discharged or resigned, and every such officer, enlisted man, or other member employed in the active service under the War Department or Navy Department on or before November 11, 1918, and hereafter discharged or resigned under conditions entitling him to compensation, shall be held and taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service."

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAGEE: On page 15, after line 18, insert as a separate section the following:

"SEC. —. Paragraph 5 of section 302 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'5. If the disabled person is so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant, such additional sum shall be paid, but not exceeding $50 per month, as the director may deem reasonable.'"

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FISH. When will it be in order to offer an amendment to the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to offer an amendment to the language in the bill?

Mr. FISH. To the language in the bill covering the same proposition as is covered by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the situation, it is this: The amendment of the gentleman from New York is offered as a new section at the end of the section just read. If that section is put and carried, no further debate or amendment would be in order upon the section just read. The Chair will therefore recognize any gentleman who desires to make a perfecting amendment to the section which has just been read.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I did not so understand the gentleman from New York. I understood the gentleman from New York was offering an amendment to the original provision, which is not contained in this present bill.

Mr. FISH. The amendment which I seek to offer comes under section 302, paragraph 3, of the war risk insurance act.

Mr. TOWNER. So that the Chair will perceive that that would not be in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that an amendment to the amendment just read would be in order.

Mr. TOWNER. The Chair is correct in that, but this is an amendment to section 302, and that is the section sought to be amended by the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MERRITT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfecting amendment to section 300.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will offer it as a preferential amendment?

Mr. MERRITT. Would I not have preference?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that would have preference over the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MERRITT. My amendment is this: On page 14, line 24, after the word "(female)" insert the words "student nurses (female) and reconstruction aids." Also, on line 25, after the word "(female)," insert the same words, and after the word "(female)," on lines 3 and 4, on page 15, insert the same words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MERRITT: Page 14, line 24, after the word "(female)," insert "and student nurses (female) and reconstruction aids." In line 25, after the word "(female)," insert "and student nurses (female) and reconstruction aids." Page 15, line 3, after the word "(female)," insert "and student nurses (female) and reconstruction aids." On page 15, line 14, after the word "(female)," insert "and student nurses (female) and reconstruction aids."

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is to take care of a considerable number—I do not know how many—of deserving cases where women, at the request of the Government, when the Army nurses were not sufficient to take care of the men, volunteered and went into the hospitals, some of them overseas and some of them here, at very small compensation, under the orders of the War Department, in every way subject to the orders of the Army as much as the regular nurses. Some of them suffered from wounds. It seems to me that merely because they are called "student nurses" instead of "Army nurses" is no reason why they should not receive the same treatment. This is true also of reconstruction aids, although, I think, their service was mostly in this country. And I think the amendment will appeal to the members of this committee without extended argument.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Would this include female members of the Salvation Army who may have been injured while serving doughnuts to the men in the trenches abroad?

Mr. MERRITT. It does not.

Mr. WALSH. Was there any provision to take care of them when killed or injured under fire?

Mr. MERRITT. Not in my amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Then you are forgetting somebody in this bill.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As I understand it, these women were subject at all times to War Department orders and served in hospitals and in the field and performed identically the same kind of service as that rendered by the Regular Army nurses, and they are precluded from the benefits of this act by technical regulations of the War Department.

Mr. MERRITT. I think the exclusion is technical.

Mr. WALSH. It is not technical at all. It was never intended to take care of them.

Mr. RAYBURN. There has been no contention that these people were in active service, has there? Surely the gentleman does not contend that, does he?

Mr. MERRITT. A great many of them were. I think a great many of them went overseas.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the Members of the House that the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] was presented to the committee, and after careful consideration we concluded not to place it in the bill. Under section 300 we take care of all commissioned officers, enlisted men, members of the Army Nurse Corps (female), and members of the Navy Nurse Corps (female), when employed in active service in the War and Navy Departments, and that is limited to the dates between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918.

It is not believed to be wise to open up this matter to take care of student nurses or others who may have had an indefinite service connected with the Army or the Navy. It would be impossible for us to determine where to stop. We are taking care of those who were definitely connected with the service. I do not believe that this amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 15, line 8, after the word "misconduct," to add the words "if involving moral turpitude."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan: Page 15, line 8, after the word "misconduct," insert "if involving moral turpitude."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in order to make this a more liberal and more just provision. It happened a great many times that men received injuries while acting in disobedience of orders, or at least while acting not strictly in compliance with orders. In the last Congress when a similar measure was under consideration an amendment of this kind was offered and adopted, and during its consideration instances were given where soldiers, contrary to orders, attempted to get on railroad trains to join their comrades after the trains had started and were injured. Instances were given in which there was evidence of some carelessness, perhaps overzeal, overanxiety of the soldier to perform service, to do his duty as he saw it, but contrary to orders, and injury resulted to him under such circumstances that those in command and those considering the proposition later found that he had received the injury as a result of his willful misconduct, as they termed it. Now, it would seem to me to be fair, right, and just to adopt this amendment to take care of cases of that kind. As I say, the House has considered the very same proposition before in the same connection and took the action that I now suggest to be taken.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. There were many instances where aviators had gone beyond the bounds prescribed by the Army, and technically they would be unable to get compensation or any relief under this bill, and this will protect men under such circumstances.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman would not call a thing of that kind willful misconduct, would he?

Mr. REED of New York. It was so construed, and that is why these words were put in the amendment the last time. It was so construed and brought to my attention by one of the departments.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I remember it was on the gentleman's motion that these words "moral turpitude" were inserted in the original Sweet bill.

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. They were inserted, I think, in two places.

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Can the gentleman suggest why they were not inserted in this place?

Mr. SWEET. Because section 300 relates purely to compensation, and where the words "willful misconduct involving moral turpitude" were inserted in section 31 in what is known as the Sweet bill, they were inserted as relating to men who had been passed upon by the draft board. It related to their conduct between the time they were passed upon by the draft board and the time of their enrollment in the active service. That was an uncertain period, and I remember very well that the gentleman's amendment was put in there, and I have before me section 7 of the bill where those words were inserted, but they were not inserted in section 300, which was amended and passed upon at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I ask for three minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] asks why these words were not inserted in another place also. In my judgment they ought to be inserted in all the places where the other words occur, to cover any case where a soldier on account of overzeal or anxiety to perform service exceeded his orders, violated instructions, and under the strict military law was guilty of willful misconduct. The fact that the words should be inserted in some other place also is not an argument or an excuse against this amendment which I offer.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. Has the gentleman made any inquiries of the War Risk Bureau which enable him to state how many applications for compensation have been rejected because of the language now in the law, which applications would have been granted had the gentleman's amendment been in the law?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have made no inquiry myself, so have no first-hand information, but I have heard Members and others say that they know of instances where claims were not allowed because of willful misconduct under just such circumstances as I have stated, such strict construction of military rules and orders as to work hardship and, I believe, injustice.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

UMI

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 19, after the figures "1917," insert "or for a disability existing prior to examination, acceptance, and enrollment for service."

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced this amendment more for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee whether he considers that lines 16, 17, and 18, on page 15, are sufficient to secure to every draftee the position that these words seem to imply, but which the words on page 14 seem to restrict. In other words, Mr. Chairman, what I am trying to get at is to definitely fix the time of the physical status. I have had within a week two cases under my personal observation. One was where a man suffered from trouble with his eyes in the form of blindness, and the director said that under section 300 he construed the law in such a way as to give the man insurance, although the insurance bureau thought that the trouble with his eyes existed before the man was enrolled into the service. In another case the bureau took exactly the opposite view and claimed that the man was unfit for service when examined by the draft board and when examined by the Army board, refusing the draftee compensation. He had two official examinations on the part of the Government and they refused his claim. As a matter of fact when he was examined it was known to the community, or it was believed by them that he was unfit—that he was defective. He had had two examinations. Now, what I want to know is, Does the government want a back door out of which to crawl in certain case and set up its judgment arbitrarily that a man was unfit and defective before his examination and enrollment into the service, or is the law such that if one is admitted into the service and enrolled he shall be regarded and held to be in a sound condition.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman over on that side let us in on this conversation.

Mr. LAYTON. I will let the gentleman in as far as I am concerned. There is no secret about what I am trying to do. I think there should be a different determination as to the status of every draftee. It is my judgment that a man having been drafted and appears before a board duly constituted by the Government for examination and then goes to the encampment, is passed by the encampment surgeon, who states he is qualified and fit for the service, is then enrolled into the service, that that should stop all question as to his physical disability antecedent to his enrollment.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is not that the law now?

Mr. LAYTON. Well, I can not get a statement to that effect from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BRIGGS. For those between April 6, 1917, and the armistice.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman has not yet given me a chance to answer. Section 300 as amended contains, in addition to the language of the original section 300 of the war risk act, the following:

Or after April 6, 1917, or for an aggravation of a disability existing prior to examination, acceptance, and enrollment for service, when such aggravation was suffered and contracted in the line of duty on or after April 6, 1917.

That provision takes care of the aggravation of an injury that existed at the time the man entered the service.

Mr. LAYTON. That is for an aggravation of a physical condition existing prior to the enlistment.

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. LAYTON. How about a case where there is no claim for aggravation?

Mr. SWEET. In the latter part of the section we use this language:

And hereafter discharged or resigned under conditions entitling him to compensation, shall be held and taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service.

Mr. LAYTON. Now, I have one more short question. Mr. Chairman, is it your belief and your opinion as chairman of this committee and the author of this bill that every draftee stands or falls for compensation and for all other claims from the time he was enlisted into the service?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York will first be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAGEE: Page 15, line 18, insert as a separate section the following: "Paragraph 5, section 302 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows: '5. If the disabled person is so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant, such additional sum shall be paid, not exceeding $50 a month, as the director may deem reasonable.'"

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. FISH. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FISH. When will it be in order to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman from New York has concluded the remarks on his amendment.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, it must be conceded that an allowance of $20 per month for an attendant for a totally disabled person is wholly inadequate. It is estimated that the number of ex-service men allowed such amount by the director is from 2,000 to 2,500. It is further estimated that approximately 47 per cent of that number carried insurance issued by the Bureau of War Risk at the time of receiving disability. They have been paid and will continue to be paid monthly payments upon their policies. The maximum policy is $10,000, which carries a monthly payment of $57.50. The policies run from such maximum down to $1,000. The only objection that I have heard to increasing the allowance is the existence of these policies of insurance and the monthly payments thereon.

My contention is that such insurance taken out by a person has no connection whatever with the compensation to be paid to him by the Government by reason of disabilities received in the service. The policy of insurance is based upon a voluntary contract. The compensation for disability is based upon injuries received in service required by the Government. There is no reason why a soldier drafted into the service should be penalized because he did not voluntarily enter into a contract with the Government for insurance. The lack of foresight in not taking out a policy of insurance can not in any sense lessen the obligation of the Government to provide reasonably for the care and support of those totally disabled in war. If our foresight were as good as our hindsight, what wonderful beings we would be.

Therefore, the only question involved in this amendment is what will be an adequate allowance for the purposes contemplated by the Congress. I have proposed $50 per month, which appears to me to be an irreducible minimum. The men who get the allowance are young and you can not confine them between four walls. If the man has lost both eyes, yet he wants to go to the theater and other places of amusement and hear music and song just as much as you or I. If the man has lost both legs or both arms, he enjoys a ride in the country or a ball game just as much as anybody. They are simply human, and the Nation is obligated to provide reasonably for their care and safety.

In one of the Liberty bond drives I had the honor to sit upon the same platform with one of these heroes and to hear him speak. He told the people how he had both eyes shot out by a German machine-gun bullet at Chateau-Thierry, when he, as an expert rifleman, was picking off German machine gunners. I can see him as if it were only yesterday urging everybody to stand by their Government, the best Government on earth. And then knocking his cane on the platform he moved toward the front and said:

If this Nation should ever again become involved in war, I would gladly volunteer to serve my country in any available capacity.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. In a moment.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman is offering an amendment to increase the compensation of a man who was totally permanently disabled to $150 a month. Is he going to offer an amendment, if his present amendment be adopted, to increase the compensation of a man having double total disability to $300 a month?

Mr. MAGEE. That is not my amendment. My amendment is to increase the allowance the director may allow from $20 to $50 per month.

Talk about patriotism. Here is a boy who has lost his vision in war; who can never see God's sunlight again; who can never see again the trees, the grass, the flowers—any of the beautiful things in this world; who can never again look upon the face of his wife or sit enraptured over the playful smile of his baby girl. I must confess that I feel unfit to plead the cause of such a hero, of such a patriot.

I appreciate that if we could have a yea-and-nay vote upon this amendment, there would probably not be a vote cast against it in the House. But no one can tell what may be done in Committee of the Whole, where the record tells no tales; therefore I trust that Members of the House who feel as I do will rise in their seats and say a word in favor of this amendment, placing themselves on record in perpetuity in favor thereof. I am curious to know whether any Member of the House will have the nerve to rise in his seat and oppose this amendment. If so, let him also go down in the record in perpetuity in opposition to granting this relief for these totally disabled heroes. But when he has done that, let him forever afterwards hold his peace and stop telling the American people what he is willing to do for the man who lost both legs, or both arms, or both eyes upon the field of battle, at the happy dawn of manhood, in the service of his country. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that a perfecting amendment ought to be presented before the argument is concluded upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be in order to debate a perfecting amendment when it is offered, both for and against. The Chair would state that there is a reservation of a point of order pending which will have to be disposed of before an amendment to the amendment would be in order. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I always listen with interest to an argument made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE]. I do not think there is a Member of this House who is able to present any matter with more force or logic or with more eloquence than my friend from New York, and I know of no subject which can be treated so eloquently as the question of giving compensation to the American soldier, particularly to the American soldier who has been severely wounded in the defense of his country. The soldier has always been the universal hero. He has been the theme of the poet; his has been the form for the sculptor and the painter. Singers of all time have voiced his praise in song and around and about him the world's history has been written. We are now dealing with legislation by which the American Congress undertakes to compensate the American soldier for injuries which he received. If a bill were to be brought here to pay $2,000 a month to the American soldier who on the field of battle lost both his hands or was blinded forever, every man on the floor of the House knows that the $2,000 per month would not compensate him, because there is no way of compensating the man who has been blinded on the field of battle. He could only be compensated in the knowledge of the fact that the American people who live under the flag that he served so well, who will receive the benefits which he has wrought by his devotion to the country, will always in their hearts remember him as an American hero. I do not think it well becomes a man in a legislative body to challenge anyone to go on record as opposed to an amendment which would increase their compensation upon the ground that such Member thereby fails to appreciate that heroic sacrifice.

We pay the man who has been blinded $200 per month. If the gentleman's logic must be followed, then we should increase it to $1,000 or $10,000 per month, because we can not pay him too much. But we have had the Civil War, we have had the War of 1812, we have had the Spanish-American War, where men have been wounded and men have suffered. We have pensioned them, and by the provisions of the bill under consideration we pay two or three times the amount that has been heretofore recognized in all history as being the proper compensation to pay. Therefore I have no hesitation in opposing the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which proposes when there is a total disability, where we pay $20 a month all told in cases of helplessness, to increase that amount by $30. I have no hesitation in opposing it, and I have no apology to make for opposing it. And I do not feel in opposing it that I am minimizing the respect, admiration, and devotion which all America has for the American soldier. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. Does the gentleman from Iowa insist upon his point of order?

Mr. SWEET. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to strike out the figures "$50" and insert the figures "$100."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TOWNER to the amendment offered by Mr. MAGEE: Strike out the figures "$50" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$100."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think that the members of the committee can readily see the reason why this committee, which has acted so generously, so fairly with regard to so many of the provisions of the bill, have, as I believe, not done exact justice to the requirements in this particular case. It lies in this fact: This appears as additional compensation to the liberal allowance which I grant has been given to cases of total disability. But this provision is not an additional compensation to the soldier. It is for help and expert care when needed.

The provisions of the original act were as follows:

If the disabled soldier is so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant, such additional sum shall be paid, but not exceeding $20 per month, as to the director may seem reasonable.

The gentleman from New York has offered this amendment to $50, and I am offering an amendment to increase it to $100. I am doing so upon this ground, very briefly stated: I am not going to appeal to your sympathies. I am going to place this as a strict proposition of experience and knowledge, as the result of actual experience in the operation of the law and this provision of it. This amendment was called to my attention by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], who obtained considerable information regarding the operation of the law, and I am very sorry, indeed, that he is not here to present the matter himself, because he could do it very much better than I. This is the condition: You can not hire a nurse for $20 a month. This is a proposition involved in cases of total disability, in cases where men are absolutely in need, as the provision of the law is, of the care of a nurse. What are you going to pay for the nurse? Can you obtain a nurse for $20 a month? Everyone knows that is impossible. Everyone knows that the $20 a month can not obtain a nurse for the purpose of assisting in cases of this kind.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. In just a moment. There are now 500 cases as reported by the Director of the War Risk Bureau, where men have made application for this $20 a month. Two hundred of those cases are cases of total blindness. The conditions are such as warrant in cases of this kind the adoption of my amendment. They are not very numerous, fortunately for us. I presume most of them have now made their applications. As I stated, there are 500 cases of total disability because of the loss of both arms or both legs or of total blindness. In these cases where they need the services of an attendant nurse, how are you going to provide the nurse? For $20 a month? Certainly not. I can imagine cases where $20 a month might be all that would be needed. I can imagine a case where a blind man could secure, perhaps, some one to lead him around for $20 a month, but that would be an exceptional case, if any such exists. It is in a case where a qualified nurse is needed, and for which this House ought to provide. There are many cases which are particularly distressing, where soldiers are not only totally disabled but in such a condition of body and mind as to require the constant need of a skilled nurse, and that you can not possibly obtain for less than $100 a month. Gentlemen should remember this. It is not a case where it goes to a soldier merely as additional compensation. It can be given only by the approval of the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and only when he shall approve it is the allowance to be made; and as individual cases may require he may allow compensation for the nurse in the sum of $10, $20, $40, $50, $75, or $100, if required. If the service of the nurse shall be required, we ought to so provide up to the limit of $100.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to inquire of the gentleman what amount is paid under the Spanish-American War veteran and Civil War veteran acts, described by the gentleman?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to my friend from Indiana, whatever may be the allowance in such cases, we have a duty upon us to give what is needed. We have 500 cases of total disability. That is what we are legislating for now. I would meet any case for a Spanish War veteran or anybody else who has so served his country in a condition such as this. We are met with these awful conditions, of 500 living men who are totally disabled, and in this case where a nurse is required we are called upon to limit the pay of the nurse to $20 a month. Can any gentleman defend that proposition?

Mr. DENISON. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that we have a great many more than 500 cases of old veterans of the Civil War who are paralytic, some of them who can not move their hands or feet, and we give them $72 a month.

Mr. TOWNER. Does the gentleman from Illinois think that is justified?

Mr. DENISON. I think before we go to increasing these amounts too much we had better even it up.

Mr. TOWNER. I am perfectly willing to go as far as the gentleman is in any case of this kind and character, and we have conditions now that we ought to meet.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I desire to say the gentleman from Illinois is in error in saying they are only getting $72 a month in case of total permanent disability. The law gives much more than $72; it goes to $100 now.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that that is in order.

Mr. FISH. As a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. FISH to the amendment offered by Mr. TOWNER——

The CHAIRMAN. Is it offered as a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], or as a substitute for the original amendment?

Mr. FISH. It can not be both.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the reason the Chair asks.

Mr. FISH. It is a substitute for the last amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not proper to vote upon a perfecting amendment at this time before a substitute is offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is in order to offer a substitute for the original amendment before a vote is taken upon a perfecting amendment, and when the vote is finally taken the vote will come first upon the perfecting amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me suggest to the Chair that it can not be determined as to how the substitute will operate until the perfecting amendment has been determined. If the perfecting amendment shall increase the amount to $100, then it would be whether the substitute operates upon that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is in order to offer a substitute for the original amendment. The Chair will direct the Clerk to report the substitute for the original amendment and it can then be determined whether it is properly a substitute or not.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the gentleman is too late. The Chair had already recognized the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have no desire to take precedence, but I desire to be recognized later if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at the proper time. The Clerk will report the substitute for the original amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH, as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MAGEE: After section 302, paragraph 3, of the war risk insurance act insert:

"If and while the disability is rated as total and permanent, the rate of compensation shall be $100 per month: Provided, however, That the loss of both feet or both hands or the sight of both eyes shall be deemed to be double, total, permanent disability: Provided further, That no rating shall be changed at any time without a medical examination at the time of rerating, which must show a change of condition to warrant the rerating: Provided further, That for double, total, permanent disability the rate of compensation shall be $200 per month."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is that amendment offered to line 19, page 15, under section 19? We have not read that yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is offered as an amendment to paragraph 3, section 19.

Mr. FISH. I will offer it as an amendment to the substitute without reference to the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York now states that he offers it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE], without reference to the lines to which it is offered. Is there objection to the proposal of the gentleman from New York as indicated? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] reserves a point of order against the substitute. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is recognized.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides for double permanent compensation for three classes of men—the blinded, the men without two arms, and men without two legs. Now, when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] had the amendment, which was just offered here by the gentleman from Iowa, I agreed to support his amendment when he came to me about it, although I had this particular one in view. But since then, in speaking before an American Legion post in the city of Washington, I submitted the amendment of Mr. WOODRUFF in order to get their views, saying that I was in sympathy with it, but the entire post after discussing it thought it would be preferable to have the compensation go direct to the soldier rather than making the $100 go direct to the attendant. For that reason I am offering this amendment, because it seems preferable that the $100 should go direct to the soldier rather than to the attendant, thereby giving the soldier the complete control of the money.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. For a brief question.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not more than likely that most of these soldiers without two eyes would live with their families, and that their total expenses of living would not amount to $100?

Mr. FISH. I will get to that in a minute. Unfortunately the gentleman from Indiana made the erroneous statement that the blinded men now come under the double permanent compensation, which is not a fact. They receive, instead of $200, as stated by the gentleman, $100, the same as those men who are to-day receiving benefits from vocational training.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It was not Mr. BLAND but myself that made that statement. But I said that both blind and crippled received $200. They must be both blind and crippled.

Mr. FISH. There are just two such cases in the country.

Now, let us consider this fact impartially. One amendment provides for giving the men increased compensation of $100 to go to the attendant; mine provides for giving these three classifications $100, to go to themselves. I have left out purposely the bedridden who are in the hospitals. They can not make any use of this increase of $100.

In answer to the question of the gentleman from that side, it is perfectly obvious that the extra $100 going to the blinded man or the man without two arms or two legs, who can not get any benefits from vocational training, will help that man to live comfortably at home and make it possible for him to receive at home not only the necessities but the comforts of life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FISH. It seems to me that we want to take care of these men to the best of our ability and not to go beyond anything that is reasonable, but we should give them enough to live comfortably for the rest of their lives. The war will never be at an end for these men until they pass from this earth, and while they are here it seems to me that $200 is little enough to provide for proper and adequate care and treatment of these 200 men who gave the best part of their lives to their country. And I hope in judging between these amendments you will be very careful to distinguish between them and see that the money goes to the soldier rather than to the attendant.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1811) to amend the Federal farm loan act as amended, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAYBURN and Mr. McSWAIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is recognized.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, since 1917 I have been on this floor and in committees laboring to try to do justice to the ex-service men. And I think I have about as good a right to speak for them as some other gentlemen who appear upon this floor periodically without information, and who seek to lecture other people about what their duty is. I have never yet boasted of my political courage, and I doubt the political courage of any man who doubts the political courage of everybody else. [Applause.]

I have been here since the war risk insurance act was passed first, working at this matter. I do not walk in here about once every 12 months and read a sloppy speech about the soldier in order to mail it out. I am of the opinion that the courageous men who fought this war will have more respect for the man who is willing to do his duty only than for the one who is trying to appear that he is the only friend they have got in all the great American Congress. [Applause.]

You may adopt the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] if you desire. When you adopt that amendment, then every man who votes for it ought to vote to give the soldier who has double total disability $400 a month. That is the only answer. What have we done? We give to the man who is totally disabled $100 a month. If he had insurance at the rate of $10,000, he gets $57.50 and $20 for a nurse. That is $177.50 a month that you are not paying to the soldier, but that you are paying to somebody to take care of him.

Mr. SWING. May I ask a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I can not yield.

Mr. SWING. Referring to the question of insurance, does it make any difference whether it is Government insurance or private insurance? If he got it from the Government, he paid it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am talking about what he is getting.

Mr. FISH. What is the difference the gentleman makes between the man who is blinded or the man without two legs and two arms, and totally disabled, there being two such cases in the country?

Mr. RAYBURN. We have said in the act that a man who is totally blind is totally disabled. If a man has two hands off he is totally disabled, and a man who has two feet off is totally disabled, and a man who has two eyes out and two legs off is doubly disabled.

Mr. FISH. Can the gentleman tell me the distinction between a man without two legs and two arms and two eyes and men in this country who are permanently disabled?

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman can not see the difference in the condition of a man with both eyes out and a man with both of his hands off and both of his eyes out, it appears to me he is pretty hard to argue with.

A man appeared before our committee who had both eyes out and both hands off, and for that reason we drew the provision that such a man was doubly totally disabled. There is nothing under the sun that that man can do for himself; not a thing.

Now, you take these men who are bedridden. A man who is bedridden can not spend money. A man who is bedridden is being taken care of by somebody, and we are giving that somebody $120 to do it. That man is either at home or in a hospital somewhere. That is all there is about it.

Now, following up what the gentleman from Indiana said, you could not compensate that man for losing both eyes if you paid him a million dollars a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. But we can appropriate money that will make him reasonably comfortable.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In making up your mind on that subject have you considered the fact that in 1889 the general pension bill was passed for Civil War soldiers, giving one who had lost his eyesight $100 a month? Do you not think that $100 a month then, or $100 a month during most of the time since then, has been worth more to that soldier than $200 a month now?

Mr. RAYBURN. Is the gentleman going to vote to give a man doubly totally disabled $400 a month?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I am going to vote to give him the additional.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask, are you going to vote to give a man doubly totally disabled $400 a month?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I frankly feel that you are getting up to figures where it is not necessary to take care of him, but I do not think $150 a month is too much for a man that is totally blind.

Mr. RAYBURN. These gentlemen may halt a little at $400, but there are lots of gentlemen here who, if they had the slightest suspicion that the soldier would not understand them, would vote for the $400.

I want to tell the men who come in here and shake their locks at us who have striven to do the best we could, having in mind to some extent the fitness of things—the men who want to hold us up as men who are trying to stifle matters in Committee of the Whole because we are afraid to go on record in the House of Representatives—that I have never voted here as yet in Committee of the Whole in any way otherwise than as I would go on record in the House, and I think that 90 per cent of the Members of the House do the same thing. But we must stop somewhere. We must reach the point that we believe is justice, and we must not offer amendments for the RECORD only, and in order to make speeches, so that we may try to create the impression that we are the only men in the land who love the soldier, when there is not a man in this Congress or in this land, in my opinion, worthy of the name of an American citizen who does not honor every soldier who was called to the defense of the flag during the war, whether he be wounded or not, and there is not a man on this floor with his own conscience as his guide who is not willing to do all that is necessary in order that a grateful Government may appear generous to these men who gave so much that its flag may be glorified. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not propose just now to make any suggestion as to how the soldier should be cared for. I am going to leave that to others. I want to use the little time that has been allotted to me to put in the RECORD the names of two men of my intimate acquaintance who are genuinely heroes.

When I said good-by to Capt. C. L. McNabb, of Cleveland, Ohio, on the other side of the water he seemed to be in as good health as ever a man was, and imagine my surprise when I saw him a few weeks ago in Walter Reed Hospital, after I had received a note from him, and found that he is totally paralyzed from the waist down.

I want to suggest that in connection with the proposition of the loss of both legs and both arms that there be inserted as an amendment a provision "for the loss of the use of both legs or both arms," because a man who has his legs and can not use them is equally as bad if not worse off than if he has lost his legs, because the legs are in his way.

Capt. McNabb was one of five men who volunteered——

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. I really do not see the need of the gentleman's suggestion as to the amendment of the law in that respect, because section 302, subdivision 2, provides that—

> A schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity from specific injuries or combinations of injuries of a permanent nature shall be adopted and applied by the bureau. Ratings may be as high as 100 per cent.

That answers your question.

Mr. McSWAIN. It does. I hope that interruption will not come out of my time, Mr. Chairman.

I want to tell you about C. L. McNabb. He was one of five men who volunteered to take a treatment of serum to see if the effect of influenza might not be alleviated thereby. They injected it into five men, into their spinal cords. In less than 30 days two of the five were dead and the other three are permanently paralyzed, and McNabb from his waist down is paralyzed. Yet to-day he is as cheerful and as true and as genuine an American as ever lived. He looks confidently—not complainingly, but confidently—to his countrymen in Congress.

The other soldier whose name I desire to read into the RECORD is Claude Garrett, of Laurens County, S. C. He was in the sen'or class of Clemson College and due to graduate in a few weeks when this country declared war. He immediately volunteered, entered the first training camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., and in the course of time this green civilian who now speaks to you became his corporal and slept by him; his cot was next to mine. This precious boy was a comfort and a cheer to every man in the squad.

He chose the Air Service, went to ground school at Toronto, Canada, was amongst the very first who went to the other side, and in combat his plane was shot by a German plane. It caught on fire. In the effort to escape with his life he climbed out on the wings and was there suspended as the fire from the gasoline tank followed him out. Finally the plane overtopped and they crashed to the ground together. When the body of Claude Garrett was discovered it was found that the fingers of his hands had been charred by the fire.

I hope that the House will excuse me for taking these minutes in order that the RECORD may show to his widowed mother in Laurens, S. C., that his fellow countrymen honor his memory. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will not the gentleman make that 10 minutes? I would like 5 minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not want to delay the consideration of the bill, but I would like a few minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, has not debate been exhausted on all these pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is still in order to make one speech in opposition to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. A motion to limit debate does not affect the rules of debate. If the time had expired on all amendments, the time would be exhausted under the other rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KNUTSON and Mr. SWEET rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], a member of the committee.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the amendments proposed should not be adopted. Under division 3 of section 302, referring to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, it is provided that if disability is rated as total and permanent, the rate of compensation shall be $100. Then the following provision is made:

Provided, however, That the loss of both feet, or both hands, or the sight of both eyes, or the loss of one foot and one hand, or one foot and the sight of one eye, or one hand and the sight of one eye, or becoming helpless and permanently bedridden, shall be deemed to be total, permanent disability.

And then this provision is made:

Provided further, That for double total permanent disability the rate of compensation shall be $200 per month.

In addition to that, under section 5, to which all the other amendments are directed, $20 per month is to be paid for a nurse or attendant, in the discretion of the director. In other words, when a person is totally and permanently disabled, he receives $100 a month and in addition to that $20; and as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has well said, if he has $10,000 insurance, there would be in addition to that $57.50, or a total of $177.50, and that amount is drawn by that man as long as he is totally and permanently disabled.

There has been considerable argument as to men who have lost both eyes; but it seems to me that where a man receives $177.50 during the remainder of his life he is receiving an equitable amount.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Suppose a soldier has no relatives, and has to hire a nurse at the prevailing rate, and does not have any insurance. How does the gentleman think he could live on $120 a month?

Mr. SWEET. The hospital will take care of that.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. He is not eligible to a hospital. If he has lost both arms or legs, he would not be admissible to a hospital. Yet he is totally and permanently disabled.

Mr. SWEET. When he has no dependents, $120 a month will take care of him.

Mr. FESS. Under that total disability he can make application for rehabilitation and receive training at the expense of the Government.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If he is totally disabled, he can not be trained much.

Mr. FESS. Total disability would be the loss of both feet, or both hands, or the sight of both eyes, or the loss of one foot and one hand, or one foot and the sight of one eye, or one hand and the sight of one eye.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If he is able to take training, he is not totally disabled.

Mr. FESS. The loss of both feet or both hands, or the sight of both eyes, or the loss of one foot and one hand, or one foot and the sight of one eye, or one hand and the sight of one eye, is defined by the law as total disability.

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. FESS. A man who is totally disabled is eligible to take training, and get the assistance of the Government in that way.

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. YATES. Suppose instead of having $10,000 insurance he has only $1,000 insurance. Then he would get only $5.75 a month would he not?

Mr. SWEET. That is true. That would give him $125.75.

Mr. YATES. That is not enough.

Mr. SWEET. While we were considering these provisions a young man by the name of Henry Bitter, from my own district, appeared before our committee. He had lost both eyes and both hands; and we said, "What is a reasonable sum for a man in that condition, taking into consideration all the equities in the case?" And we finally determined that he should receive $200 per month, and so we placed in the bill the provision for double total permanent disability. In addition to that Henry Bitter has $10,000 insurance, and so to-day he is receiving $257.50 a month.

Now, if we put the matter on that basis—and as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], there is an additional $20, which makes it $277.50—I say, gentlemen of the House, that if we endeavor to place these men back where they were when they entered the service, money can not do it, but the question is how to deal equitably with the man and deal equitably with the Government.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the committee, and the Chair does not think he ought to entertain a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. KNUTSON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not proper under the rules of the House to ask for unanimous consent? It seems to me the House does not wish to bind itself so that we can not ask unanimous consent for a proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is a Member of the House. The Chair thinks that where the House has by a vote fixed the limit of debate upon an amendment, the Chair ought to enforce the decision of the committee with respect to debate, and to refuse the request of a Member of the House for unanimous consent to enlarge it.

Mr. KNUTSON. When the motion was made to limit debate the gentleman from Minnesota withheld objection under the impression that he would get a portion of the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regrets the gentleman from Minnesota was under a misapprehension. It is not within the power of the Chair to correct that misapprehension. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE], and the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, after line 18, insert as a separate section the following: "SEC. —. Paragraph (5) of section 302 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(5) If the disabled person is so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant, such additional sum shall be paid, but not exceeding $50 per month, as the director may deem reasonable.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TOWNER to the amendment offered by Mr. MAGEE: Strike out the figures "$50" and insert "$100."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE]. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. FISH for the amendment offered by Mr. MAGEE: "If and while the disability is rated as total and permanent the rate of compensation shall be $100 per month: Provided, however, That the loss of both feet or both hands or the sight of both eyes shall be deemed to be double total permanent disability: Provided further, That no rating shall be changed at any time without a medical examination at the time of rerating, which must show a change of conditions to warrant the rerating: Provided further, That for double total permanent disability the rate of compensation shall be $200 per month."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FISH) there were 23 ayes and 71 noes.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. YATES) there were 37 ayes and 66 noes.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. Section 305 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 305. Upon its own motion or upon application the bureau may at any time review an award, and, in accordance with the facts found upon such review, may end, diminish, or increase the compensation previously awarded, or, if compensation is increased, or, if compensation has been refused or discontinued, may award compensation in proportion to the degree of disability sustained as of the date such degree of disability began."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 25, and page 16, line 1, strike out all of line 25 and the four words of line 1, page 16, and insert the word "and."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, the section as amended will read as follows:

SEC. 305. Upon its own motion or upon application the bureau may at any time review an award, and, in accordance with the facts found upon such review, may end, diminish, or increase the compensation previously awarded, and may award compensation in proportion to the degree of disability sustained as of the date such degree of disability began.

I assume that the purpose of the revision of section 305 is to take care of this kind of a case: A man is in receipt of total temporary disability which of course carries a rate of 100 per cent. Then wrongfully and without reason, as the facts later develop, that man is reduced in compensation by the War Risk Bureau to 50 per cent. I have had many such cases in my own congressional experience. The purpose of the committee amendment, at least in part, is to enable the bureau to rerate at the higher percentage as of the date the wrongful ruling was handed down. But if the committee will look into the language it will see that it does not accomplish that result. It provides that if the compensation is increased, or if the compensation has been refused or discontinued, then it may be possible to date back the rerating

But if, as in the case put, compensation has been reduced, there is no provision for dating back the rerating which restores the previous higher figure. In my own experience the usual case where an injustice has been done by the War Risk Bureau, is in case of a reduction of the compensation award. As I read the section as it stands, it does not enable rerating to date back in such case.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The language which the gentleman seeks to strike out is intended to cover cases where there is a rerating, and in the event that there is an increase based on that new claim, the increase will take effect on the previous date; or, if there has been a refusal heretofore to make an award at all, and the director shall decide under a reexamination that there ought to be an award, the award shall take effect from the previous date. If the gentleman strikes that language out, it would be left in doubt whether upon a new award or upon reconsideration or refusal to make award the director could date the award back.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will notice, I am simply striking out the "if" clauses so as to enable the bureau to rerate retroactively in all cases, when the review has been completed.

Mr. BARKLEY. If you strike that language out, you undergo the danger of limiting it to awards already in existence, and ignoring cases where they have refused to make an award but desire to reconsider and make one.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. Take, for instance, the illustration given by the gentleman himself. A man has been rated as having a total temporary disability, and then upon a further examination it is found that he should not have that rating but that it should be reduced, and if that new rating goes back as of the date when the degree of disability began it raises the question of a refund between that man and the Government, and consequently the soldier would have an obligation to pay the Government and would have to wait before his compensation would be continued. That language is put in there deliberately and carefully to meet that situation.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the gentleman does not quite understand my illustration. I am assuming a case where a claimant first receives an award of total temporary disability and then later the bureau, without just cause, reduces that rating to 50 per cent. Then the Congressman has the case brought to his attention and asks for a review. As a result the bureau finds that the reduction was without warrant and orders that 100 per cent disability be restored to the claimant.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. If the language as it is now carried in the bill is retained, it would seem to me that the War Risk Bureau would have no right to date back the resumption of the total disability award, because the language of the bill is that—

If compensation is increased, or if compensation has been refused or discontinued—then the award may date back; but if the compensation has been reduced there is no provision for its dating back.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is mistaken about that, because this might happen: If there had been a previous reduction of award and upon reconsideration there was an increase, then that would come in under the language in the bill and would date back just as if the reduction had never been made. That language applies to the action of the bureau at the present time in making a change in the award, and it has no relation to any reduction that may have occurred theretofore.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman think that it might be desirable to replace my amendment so as to leave the language in the bill as it now stands, with the addition of the use of the word "reduced," after the word "refused," in line 1 of page 16?

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is a suggestion which I was about to make.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think that is necessary, but I would defer to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. ROGERS. It had not occurred to me, I confess, that these "if" clauses had any particular value, but the gentleman thinks they have. Mr. Chairman, in view of the suggestions that have been made, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and to offer a new amendment, inserting the word "reduced," after the word "refused," in line 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the first proposition of the gentleman. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting the word "reduced" after the word "refused," in line 1 on page 16, and to insert a comma after the word "refused."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 16, line 1, after the word "refused," insert a comma and the word "reduced."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to know if the gentleman can thereby cure a case which occurred to a constituent of mine a day or two ago on this very question. He was getting $20 a month, and they rerated him and sent him a letter on the 26th day of May saying that his compensation had been reduced to $12.50 from $80 a month, which he never had been getting. On the same day they wrote him another letter, saying that his compensation of $12 a month has been discontinued, and that he was determined to be below the compensation condition. Can the gentleman fix that kind of a case. Both of those letters were written on the same day.

Mr. ROGERS. I think that this section is a salutary one to make clear the right of the War Risk Bureau to date back an award so as to remedy any injustice.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have another instance, where a gentleman, a minister, a very distinguished one, was rated total temporary. He had an examination over at Johns Hopkins Hospital, and the doctors said that he was probably permanently totally disabled.

Then on the strength of that they reduced him to 75 per cent, and he wrote here protesting, and they answered his letter by saying, "Your letter is received and on the consideration thereof we have reduced you to 50 per cent." Is there any way of curing that kind of thing?

Mr. YATES. Is not that a very fine system, very much like what it has been during the last four years?

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will get that situation corrected and then the War Risk Bureau will be able under this section to cure the situation when a state of injustice arises.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the gentleman's amendment then will prevail.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the word "reduced" or its equivalent is necessary in order to cover every kind of case that may be presented.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I really do not believe that the gentleman's amendment changes the import of the section. I do not believe it will hurt anything, and therefore I agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MACGREGOR: Page 16, line 3, after the word "began," insert "In the event of the discontinuance or diminution of compensation notice thereof shall be transmitted to the beneficiary 30 days prior to the time such discontinuance or diminution shall take effect."

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have talked to the chairman of the subcommittee with reference to this matter of the giving of notice to the beneficiaries of a reduction of compensation. I have also a letter from the lamented Col. Galbraith upon the same proposition. Both of them agree that it should be made a departmental regulation, but I do not believe in leaving very much to departmental regulation. My experience has been we had better do it here ourselves. A man who is awarded compensation and who is dependent upon that compensation should have some preliminary notice as to its reduction. For instance, a few weeks ago I had a man who was receiving compensation of $90 a month. Without any warning whatsoever his compensation was reduced to $9 a month. Probably most of you have had similar instances. It has occurred in many, many cases which have come under my observation. Any man here who ever received a salary planned his scale of living upon that basis, and if it was suddenly chopped off he was left up in the air. How much more would it be in the case of these disabled men who are compelled to come to our Government for assistance and who are awarded compensation and base their living upon that amount, and then suddenly they are left up in the air simply by some letter from the department saying they had been cut down to a very small sum.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I will.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman's amendment contemplate giving these men an opportunity to make a showing as to their condition after these notices are given? Is that the idea of the amendment?

Mr. MACGREGOR. One object is that, of course, in giving them this notice.

Mr. RANKIN. Would it not be better to insert that in the amendment to be sure they will not be deprived of that right?

Mr. MACGREGOR. The gentleman means making their application for awards?

Mr. RANKIN. To make a showing of his condition within the 30 days.

Mr. MACGREGOR. As I would take it, under the provisions of the wording of this section he would have the right to make application for a revision of the award.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand, but it seems to me if he makes a showing before the reduction is made he would stand a much better chance of holding on to what he is getting.

Mr. MACGREGOR. It is perhaps so; but I am not going the whole way. I am only going part of the way, perhaps.

Mr. LAYTON. Does not the gentleman think he ought to add to his amendment the 30 days' notice within which time they can take an appeal, and it would serve both purposes?

Mr. MACGREGOR. As to the notice of reduction and also the taking of appeal?

Mr. LAYTON. Exactly.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Well, I do not know. I am afraid of that. I simply make this appeal. I think you gentlemen are all familiar with the situation. Time and time again I have protested against these reductions of awards and then go down and fight the department, and then they come back and make an award equal to or larger than the original award, although they stated in their original communication that the compensation was reduced. I do not think we should leave this to a departmental regulation. I think we ought to state here that these departments down here shall not diminish the compensation until the man has had some notice so that he shall have an opportunity to adjust himself and also an opportunity to protest against such reduction of award.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I do not think we ought to put too many minute and detailed regulations of this kind into a fundamental statute. Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York does not go into any detail as to how the notice should be given. It does not specify what the notice shall consist of, and if that is put into the law I should be afraid of this result following: The men to whom notices are addressed may not receive them, and they might make claim that they were not notified, and therefore their compensation or reduction of compensation could not take effect until they are given notice, which would lead to disputes between the beneficiaries and the bureau, that, in my judgment, will result in a great deal of trouble, a great deal of additional bookkeeping, and so forth. I think that the position of the gentleman from New York might well appeal to the bureau as a reason for establishing a regulation of the bureau to that effect, and I think the bureau might well have a regulation of that kind.

But it should be purely a matter of regulation and ought not to be a matter of law, because it will lead to disputes and differences and disagreements between the beneficiaries and the bureau, and I think we all know we have enough of those already.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. Section 306 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 306. No compensation shall be payable for death or disability which does not occur prior to or within one year after discharge or resignation from the service, except that where, after a medical examination made pursuant to regulations, a certificate has been obtained from the director at the time of discharge or resignation from the service, or within one year thereafter, or within one year after the passage of this act, whichever is the later, to the effect that the injured person at the time of his discharge or resignation was suffering from injury likely to result in death or disability, compensation shall be payable for death or disability whenever occurring, proximately resulting from such injury."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have been away from here for two or three days and therefore have had a chance to find out something about the sentiment of the people outside of the city of Washington. In the State of New York we furnished 367,864 soldiers for this war, almost 10 per cent of the total number in the American Army. As a result, we have a large number of injured men in our State. The people along the streets in the various towns are asking why we have not adequate hospital facilities. I venture to say that when this subject comes up in this House there are a great many men on this floor who do not know what our hospital facilities are. I also have before me a letter, which is significant. It is from a member of the American Legion, and I have received stacks of them. It says:

JAMESTOWN, N. Y., June 1, 1921.

Hon. DANIEL A. REED,
Representative in Congress forty-third district, New York,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: As a member of the American Legion, I am writing to urge upon you and the other members of the New York delegation in Congress to use your personal influence to see to it that the remedial legislation proposed by the Dawes committee and by the investigating committee of New York looking to improvement in the welfare of sick, wounded, and disabled veterans should be hastened through Congress.

The inquiry conducted by our State investigating committee has disclosed a shocking state of affairs in connection with the treatment given to these men who should be the first care of the Nation. Lack of hospitals and proper medical care is causing great suffering, particularly among the tubercular and insane, and many deaths.

———.

Now, in this connection I anticipated the request of the legion by just about one month, for on May 1 I wrote to the Treasury Department and asked for certain specific information. And I think you gentlemen will be interested to know the line of inquiry I made. I wrote this letter to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury:

MAY 6, 1921.

Col. EDWARD CLIFFORD,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COL. CLIFFORD: There is certain information which I am very anxious to obtain. Although there have been many hearings before the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee, the information that I desire, so far as I can ascertain, has not been fully developed. I trust, therefore, that you will pardon me for turning to you for specific and authentic information with reference to the hospital situation.

In order to save time and space I will put my request in the form of a questionnaire.

ARMY HOSPITALS.

1. Please state number of Army hospitals fully constructed and ready for use, location, city, and State.
Beds now available; beds occupied.
2. Please state the number of Army hospitals now under construction.
3. Are the Army hospitals now fully constructed available for use of the injured veterans of the late war?

NAVY HOSPITALS.

1. Please state number of Navy hospitals fully constructed and ready for use, location, city, and State.
Beds now available; beds occupied.
2. Please state the number of Navy hospitals now under construction.
3. Are the Navy hospitals now fully constructed available for use of the injured veterans of the late war?

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE HOSPITALS.

1. Please state number of Public Health hospitals fully constructed and ready for use, location, city, and State.
Beds now available; beds occupied.
2. Please state the number of Public Health hospitals now under construction.
3. Are the Public Health hospitals now fully constructed available for use of the injured veterans of the late war?

In this report I would like to have you let me know how many patients—veterans of the late war—are now undergoing hospitalization; the number who are unable to obtain hospitalization because of the lack of facilities.

So far as possible I would like to know what classes of injuries or ailments require special hospitals in order to properly treat the cases.

In the event that you have the facts available or can obtain them, I would like to know the number of hospitals in New York State taking care of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war; the number of patients being cared for by each; the location of each hospital; and the number of applicants for hospitalization who are unable to receive treatment because of the lack of hospital facilities.

This information will be deeply appreciated, and I am asking it for the sole purpose of preparing myself to cooperate in the very worthy work in which you and all of us are interested at the present time.

Yours, sincerely,

———.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, May 13, 1921.

From: Chief, statistical section, Medical Division.
To: Consultants on hospitalization (through the medical adviser).
Subject: Data requested May 12, 1921.

1. In response to your request dated May 12, 1921, for data concerning Federal hospitals, you are advised that it has been necessary to confine this statement in respect to hospitals of the United States Army and Navy to just those facilities which have been made available by those services to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. However, these data may be obtained, it is believed, from the offices of the Surgeons General of the Army and Navy by formal application.

ARMY HOSPITALS.

2. The Army general hospitals fully constructed and available for use to beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are as follows:
Walter Reed General Hospital, Tacoma Park, Washington, D. C.
Fitzsimons General Hospital, Denver, Colo.
Letterman General Hospital, San Francisco, Calif.
The Army and Navy General Hospital, Hot Springs, Ark.
The Post Hospital, Fort Sam Houston, Tex.
The total number of beds made available to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance by these hospitals was on May 5, 1,225, of which number 697 were used. Four Army hospitals not included in the above have been taken over by the United States Public Health Service for operation. These four hospitals are included under the paragraph devoted to the United States Public Health Service.

UNITED STATES NAVY.

3. The number of naval hospitals made available to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was, on May 5, 1921, 13, located as follows:
United States Naval Hospital, Chelsea, Mass.
United States Naval Hospital, New York, N. Y.
United States Naval Hospital, League Island, Pa.
United States Naval Hospital, Washington, D. C.
United States Naval Hospital, Norfolk, Va.
United States Naval Hospital, Charleston, S. C.
United States Naval Hospital, Key West, Fla.
United States Naval Hospital, Pensacola, Fla.
United States Naval Hospital, Gulfport, Miss.
United States Naval Hospital, New Orleans, La.
United States Naval Hospital, Great Lakes, Ill.
United States Naval Hospital, Fort Lyons, Colo.
United States Naval Hospital, San Diego, Calif.
There were made available by these hospitals 1,135 beds, of which number 327 were used on May 5, 1921.

4. The Public Health Service has made available to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance 61 hospitals, which are fully constructed and used. These hospitals are located as follows:
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 2, Boston, Mass.
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 3, Buffalo, N. Y.
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 5, Chicago, Ill.
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 6, Cleveland, Ohio.

United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 66, Carville, La.
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 67, Kansas City, Mo.
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 68, Minneapolis, Minn.
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 69, Fort Thomas, Ky.
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 70, New York, N. Y.
United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 71, Sterling Junction, Mass.

5. The total number of beds made available by these hospitals was, on May 1, 1921, 18,416. Of this number 15,599 were made available to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, of which number 13,079 were being used by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance on May 5, 1921.

6. The United States Public Health Service has at the present time under construction two new hospitals, one at Maywood, Ill., which is planned to accommodate 850 patients; the other at Dawsonsprings, Ky., which is planned to accommodate 500 patients. It is anticipated that these hospitals will be placed in operation during the present calendar year.

7. The United States Public Health Service has also taken over recently four hospitals from the United States Army, which it intends to place in operation within the near future. These hospitals and their approximate proposed bed capacity are as follows:
Fort Walla Walla, Wash., 250 beds (tuberculosis).
Fort Logan H. Root, Ark., 250 beds (tuberculosis).
Fort McKenzie, Wyo., 250 beds (neuropsychiatric).
Fort William Henry Harrison, Helena, Mont., 400 to 600 beds.

8. The United States Public Health Service is at the present time planning to take over and place in operation several private hospitals. Complete data can not be given relative to such proposals until the plans have been perfected. However, it can be stated, the first one of these private hospitals to be placed in operation will be a hospital at Colfax, Iowa, with a capacity of approximately 200 beds.

NATIONAL HOMES FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

9. The National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers have made available to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance nine soldiers' homes, two of which have been made entirely available and the remaining seven have been made in part available. These national soldiers' homes are located as follows:

Eastern Branch, Togus, Me.
Mountain Branch, Johnson City, Tenn.
Marion Branch, Marion, Ind.
Central Branch, Dayton, Ohio.
Danville Branch, Danville, Ill.
Northwestern Branch, Milwaukee, Wis.
Western Branch, Leavenworth, Kans.
Battle Mountain Sanitarium Branch, Hot Springs, S. Dak.
Pacific Branch, Los Angeles, Calif.

10. The total number of beds made available by these National Soldiers' Homes on May 5, 1921, numbered 2,618 beds, of which number 1,901 beds were being used.

11. On May 5, 1921, there were being hospitalized in all hospitals of the United States, including contract hospitals, 26,092 patients in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, classified as follows:

Tuberculosis	10,266
Neuropsychiatric	7,349
General medical and surgical	8,477

Of the total number hospitalized, 16,704 are being treated in Federal hospitals.

12. There is no information at the central office or district offices of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance that any claimant of this bureau, entitled to medical care and treatment for whom hospitalization has been advised or recommended, has failed to receive hospital care under the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

13. There is no record in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance of the number who are entitled to care and treatment under the war risk insurance act, but who have either not made claim or applied for medical treatment, or have declined such facilities as the Government has been able to offer in its own or contract hospitals.

14. It has been estimated that a third more than have been hospitalized for mental and nervous diseases would have accepted hospital care if the facilities offered had not in so many instances been in hospitals for paupers, indigents, criminal insane, etc.

15. Similarly patients who are entitled to hospital care or for whom hospital care has been urged by the medical examiners of this bureau for pulmonary tuberculosis have preferred to provide care at their own homes or in boarding houses, or at their own expense rather than to enter sanatoria such as have been available in some districts, or to submit to the necessary restraint of responsible medical hospital control.

16. There is attached hereto a list showing by name of hospital and location the contract hospitals now being used in the State of New York for the hospitalization of patients in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the number of war-risk insurance patients reported in each hospital. There is also attached a statement of the number of patients of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance being hospitalized at the present time in Federal hospitals in the State of New York. In considering the number of patients in contract hospitals as reported in this memorandum, it should be borne in mind that this report is based on the card records on file in the statistical section of the medical division of this bureau, and that due to the time necessary in preparing these forms in the hospitals and transmitting them to this bureau by mail through the offices of the district supervisors there is often a considerable lapse of time between the actual admission or discharge of a patient and its being recorded in this bureau. Therefore these records should not be considered current records, but, nevertheless, it is believed that they substantially represent the hospital situation and form a reasonable basis for consideration.

MR. A. D. HILLER,
Chief Statistical Section, Medical Division,
Room 805, Bureau of War Risk Insurance:

The following is the information desired, about which I telephoned you this a. m. Your prompt replies to the questions will be very kindly appreciated.

ARMY HOSPITALS.

1. Please state number of Army hospitals fully constructed and ready for use, location, city and State.
Beds now available; beds occupied.
2. Please state the number of Army hospitals now under construction.
3. Are the Army hospitals now fully constructed available for use of the injured veterans of the late war?

NAVY HOSPITALS.

1. Please state number of Navy hospitals fully constructed and ready for use, location, city and State.
Beds now available; beds occupied.
2. Please state the number of Navy hospitals now under construction.
3. Are the Navy hospitals now fully constructed available for use of the injured veterans of the late war?

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE HOSPITALS.

1. Please state number of Public Health hospitals fully constructed and ready for use, location, city and State.
Beds now available; beds occupied.
2. Please state the number of Public Health hospitals now under construction.
3. Are the Public Health hospitals fully constructed and ready for use of the injured veterans of the late war?

In this report I would like to have you let me know how many patients—veterans of the late war—are now undergoing hospitalization, the number who are unable to obtain hospitalization because of the lack of facilities.

So far as possible, I would like to know what classes of injuries or ailments require special hospitals in order to properly treat the cases.

In the event that you have the facts available or can obtain them, I would like to know the number of hospitals in New York State taking care of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war; the number of patients being cared for by each; the location of each hospital; and the number of applicants for hospitalization who are unable to receive treatment because of the lack of hospital facilities.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Hiller, if you are unable to supply any of the above information, and can advise through what channels we may obtain it, your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

CONSULTANTS ON HOSPITALIZATION.
By ——— ———.

Now, then, I have that information——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has very valuable information. I ask unanimous consent that he be given five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be permitted an additional five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED of New York. It is not my wish, gentlemen, to take up the time of this House. I realize that you wish to expedite this bill that is under consideration. I am going to ask for an extension of my remarks in just a moment, in which extension I am going to include all of this tabulated information. I think the disclosures will be quite surprising to the Members. It will be interesting for you to know, while we are considering this splendid measure before the House, that it required one month for the Treasury Department, which had jurisdiction of this matter, to get this highly valuable information. They were obliged to send a questionnaire to all of these various departments, and it took it one whole month to secure the information. And yet we are asked to appropriate millions of dollars without knowing what the facts may be with respect to hospitals and hospital facilities. And when we get a report from the committee of the legion, such as I have received, it simply confirms the tragic conditions that confront our soldiers who may be in need of hospitalization, especially in New York State.

The other day I had a boy come down here to see me from a not far distant hospital. He had been unable to get compensation. You men have had similar cases. This man came into the office shaking from shell shock. He looked tired and weak. I asked him if he had had his breakfast, and he said he had not. And when I asked him why, he informed me that he had just money enough to pay his way down and back. When I insisted that he tell me the facts about his financial needs he said, "I want to be honest with you. I had to make two bead necklaces and sell them, and it took me six weeks, before I could come down and present my case." I went down to the department and established the fact that the boy had a case and got his compensation of $90 a month. Now, this boy had been trying for weeks and weeks and weeks to get those results, and yet he had the proof if it had been properly prepared and presented, and his case should have received attention. Now, what has happened?

In our hospitals are hundreds of boys who have no friends to whom they can go. They are lying there bedridden, many of them, with no one to take up their cases and prepare their proof. They send in their claims; yes. The War Risk Bureau comes back with a form letter to the effect that there is not sufficient proof to connect up their injury with the service. The boy goes back to the community with a request for more affidavits, and another set of affidavits are sent on and turned down. They get discouraged. What they need is special service in our hospitals, competent men who represent the boys. It is time we found out the facts with reference to these boys. There are literally hundreds of them in our State who need hospitalization. You will recall that the State of New York voted $3,000,000 and agreed to build a hospital within a year and have it ready for our soldiers, but Congress did not see fit to authorize the Government to rent that hospital in order to take care of these boys.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to say that this bill does that very thing.

Mr. REED of New York. Exactly. I am not criticizing this bill, but I am bringing out these facts to show the necessity for acting upon the situation and knowing the conditions in this country with reference to the soldiers and acting promptly. And this information that has been secured here shows the necessity for a bill of this kind, coordinating the various departments and coordinating the work under the bill.

I am not going any further with this proposition, and I am not going to read all of this correspondence, but I am going to ask unanimous consent to insert the information that I have obtained in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY,
Washington, D. C., May 19, 1921.

GENTLEMEN: With reference to your letter of May 17, 1921, I beg leave to inform you, replying to paragraph (1), that the following information was transmitted April 1, 1921, for the information of the committee of which Gen. Charles G. Dawes was chairman, and also to your committee:

Washington, D. C	406	223	243	339
Total	10,406	2,488	7,469	5,533

[1] Gulfport, Miss., is not included.

The above information shows all the naval hospitals now in commission, but does not show the structures which have been converted or torn down since the armistice. The naval hospital at Wards Island, of 800 beds, was turned over to the Metropolitan State Hospital authorities and it is understood is now being used, in part, for the care of beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. The naval hospital, Greys Ferry Road, Philadelphia, Pa., of 900 beds, and Cape May, N. J., of 220 beds, were turned over, completely equipped, to the United States Public Health Service and, it is understood, are now in operation by that bureau for the care of War Risk patients. The naval hospital and training station at Gulfport, Miss., with 170 beds in the hospital and approximately 900 beds in the camp, has been recently turned over to the Public Health Service, completely equipped for operation by that bureau.

The beds reported vacant in the above table represent returns for the week ending March, 1921. During the year 1920 the number of Navy and Marine Corps patients has been as high as 7,576, so that there were then but 3,000 beds vacant, including those not available for general cases in contagious wards and not allowing for necessary administration leeway. It is necessary also in considering vacant beds in the Navy to provide for an excess at coastal locations, to take care of the sick of the fleet as the ships move from place to place.

At the present time the vacant beds that might be available, should sufficient Navy personnel be on hand to administer the institution, are not actually available at the southern naval hospitals owing to the white and black segregation question which has been brought up.

The naval hospitals on the west coast should not be considered as available for War Risk patients, as the small number of vacant beds must be reserved for Navy and Marine Corps personnel.

The naval hospitals at the present time have not their usual quota of sick, due largely to the recent absence of the Atlantic Fleet in southern waters, the cessation of recruiting for some months, rapid discharge of enlisted personnel to reduce the Navy to 100,000 strength, mild winter season, and early spring.

2. In reply to paragraph (2) of your letter, I am pleased to inform you that but one naval hospital is now under construction at San Diego, Calif., to replace the existing temporary institution in the San Diego exposition grounds.

3. In reply to paragraph (3), I wish to advise you that weekly reports are made to the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, indicating the availability of each naval hospital for the care and treatment of beneficiaries of that bureau. This report is based on the number of vacant beds at each hospital not needed for Navy and Marine Corps patients and on the ability of the personnel available at each place and within the medical department in general to properly care for these patients. The report of May 12, 1921, indicated 67 tuberculosis patients under treatment and 33 beds available and 324 general patients under treatment and 598 beds available.

4. In reply to paragraph (4), this question is partly answered in the preceding paragraph. The bureau is not cognizant of the number of patients undergoing hospitalization, this being a matter entirely outside its province.

5. In reply to paragraph (5), I wish to advise you that the naval hospitals admit all medical or surgical cases requiring hospital treatment, also neurological cases and psychoneurosis cases without frank mental symptoms and not requiring restraint. Such psychoneurosis cases and cases of suspected tuberculosis are only admitted for diagnosis. When diagnosed, it is expected that the patient would be removed to hospitals specializing in the treatment of such cases. All naval hospitals are general hospitals, and, while fully equipped, they are not designed to take care of psychoneurosis cases or tuberculosis cases except the naval hospital, Fort Lyon, Colo., which only takes tuberculosis cases. It is understood that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, through the United States Public Health Service, is utilizing certain civilian, State, and Government institutions for the treatment of cases requiring special care.

6. In reply to paragraph (6), I regret that I am unable to furnish you this information, as the questions asked therein are outside my cognizance and beyond the province of the bureau. The naval hospital, Brooklyn, N. Y., reports 35 general patients undergoing treatment and 65 beds available. No applications for treatment are made direct to the commanding officer of naval hospitals. War Risk patients who are received in the naval hospitals are directed to report for treatment by the local supervisor representing the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, to whom, it is understood, all applications for hospitalization are made or forwarded.

Trusting that the above may give you the information that you are seeking from the naval medical department, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

———— ————,
Surgeon General, United States Navy.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, May 24, 1921.

Mr. N. N. HEFFNER,
Secretary Consultants on Hospitalization,
Room 1023, Arlington Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of May 17, the following information is given. The paragraph numbers are yours:

	Beds now held for use for Bureau War Risk cases.	Bureau War Risk cases now using these beds.	Bureau War Risk beds now empty and therefore available to that bureau.	Total number of beds which will be available to Bureau War Risk by Oct. 1 if this office is notified in time to send personnel and make preparation.
Fitzsimons General Hospital, Denver, Colo.	500	448	52	1,200
Walter Reed General Hospital, Washington, D. C.	300	69	231	750
Letterman General Hospital, San Francisco, Calif.	250	66	184	600
Service Hospital, Fort Sam Houston, San Antonio, Tex.	250	110	140	600
Service Hospital, Fort Riley, Kans.[1]				300
Army and Navy General Hospital, Hot Springs, Ark.	150	41	109	150
Service Hospital, Fort Leavenworth, Leavenworth, Kans.[1]				100
Service Hospital, Fort Sheridan, Ill.[2]				100
Service Hospital, Fort McPherson, Atlanta, Ga.[2]				100
Service Hospital, Fort Russell, Wyo.[2]				100

[1] No beds available now or until additional personnel is sent to this hospital.
[2] Only 25 beds available at present.

2. William Beaumont General Hospital, El Paso, Tex. After July 1 this hospital will be completed. By October 1 we may be able to care for 100 Bureau of War Risk Insurance cases at this hospital, and a smaller number may be admitted July 1.

3. To the extent as shown in 1 and 2.

4. Only our general hospitals report the numbers to this office. They report 734 under treatment May 13. However, a small additional number are under treatment.

NOTE.—The Bureau of War Risk Insurance should be able to give the exact total number.

This office is unable to answer the last portion of No. 4. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance should have some data on that phase of the matter.

5. Maxillo-facial, tuberculosis, mental diseases, etc. In this connection you are advised that 10 more maxillo-facial (special) cases can be cared for at the station hospital, Jefferson Barracks, St. Louis, Mo., and at the station hospital, Columbus Barracks, Columbus, Ohio.

The Walter Reed General Hospital is the only other military hospital prepared to treat such cases.

6. No Army hospitals in New York State caring for Bureau of War Risk Insurance cases and none of sufficient size to afford available space for such work in addition to the active military sick in them.

REMARKS.

Of the maximum number of beds which will be available at station hospital, Fort Sam Houston, if you call upon us for them, 250 may be occupied by pulmonary tuberculosis if you so desire.

Of the maximum number of beds which will be available at the Walter Reed General Hospital, the Letterman General Hospital, and the station hospital, Fort Sam Houston, if you call upon us for them, 200 beds at each place may be occupied by selected (not disturbed) neuropsychiatric cases.

Very truly, yours,

FLOYD KRAMER,
Major, Medical Corps, United States Army.

CONSULTANTS ON HOSPITALIZATION,
———— ————, Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, May 25, 1921.

MISS M. M. HEFFNER,
Secretary Consultants on Hospitalization,
Room 1023 Arlington Building, Washington, D. C.

MADAM: Acknowledgment is made of your letter of May 18, 1921, making inquiry in regard to the hospital facilities of the Public Health Service available for veterans of the late World War, and in addition thereto requesting information as to the number of patients in Public Health Service hospitals, the number of hospitals, hospitals under construction, and data of a similar nature.

There are inclosed herewith a copy of bureau weekly census report of the Public Health Service hospitals for the week ending May 14, 1921, and supplement sheet thereto, which contain the information you have requested as to the number and location of Public Health Service hospitals, together with the number of beds occupied and those available in every service hospital functioning at the present time.

In reply to your second question regarding Public Health Service hospitals under construction, it is presumed that you desire information regarding those hospitals now being erected by this service, not those existing properties acquired by this service by lease or transfer which are undergoing alterations and repairs preparatory to being opened as Public Health Service institutions. There are being erected two such hospitals, one at Dawson Springs, Ky., and one at Chicago, Ill., which institutions will have bed capacities for, approximately, 500 and 850 patients, respectively.

There are, however, a number of other hospital properties which have been acquired by lease or transfer, which have not as yet been opened. These are listed below:

Colfax Hotel, Colfax, Iowa (general): Approximately 200 beds when the necessary alterations are made, for which at the present no funds are available.

Fort William Henry Harrison, Helena, Mont. (general): At the present time just being opened, with approximately 100 beds. Can be extended to more than double this capacity when funds are available and demand indicates the necessity for additional beds.

Excelsior Springs, Mo. (probably tuberculosis): An undeveloped property which could ultimately be developed to 200 or more beds when funds are available.

Hahnemann Hospital, Portland, Oreg. (general): Approximately 170 beds; expected to be ready for occupancy within the next two months.

Fort Walla Walla, Wash. (tuberculosis): Approximately 240 beds when developed. Certain amount of money available.

Fort Mackenzie, Sheridan, Wyo. (neuro-psychiatric): Approximately 400 beds; a certain amount of money available.

Fort Logan H. Roots, Little Rock, Ark. (neuro-psychiatric): Approximately 240 beds when alterations are completed.

The Public Health Service has also taken over the naval training camp at Gulfport, Miss., but is not attempting to open the same. The development of this place depends on certain decision as to whether it is to be used by the Public Health Service or as a national home for disabled soldiers; also, what class of patients are to be placed in this institution. Some difficulty has been had in the transfer of this property, and the matter is still unsettled.

In answer to your question, "Are the Public Health Service hospitals now fully constructed available for use of the injured veterans of the late war?" you are answered affirmatively.

With regard to your fourth question, by referring to the inclosed census report sheet you will be able to ascertain the number of cases hospitalized by the Public Health Service. So far as the Public Health Service is concerned, it is believed to be more or less accurate to say that no discharged soldier has applied for treatment to the Public Health Service who has not been offered such facilities as exist. Many have been unwilling to accept these facilities, and for this reason remain unhospitalized. The number of these is problematical. It is suggested that further information relative to this matter could probably be obtained from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

With reference to the question as to what classes require special hospitals for their care and treatment, the Public Health Service in general operates three classes of hospitals—tuberculosis, neuro-psychiatric, and general. Certain hospitals have been designated to receive patients with surgical tuberculosis, special personnel and equipment being supplied. The same arrangement applies to chronic bronchitis, asthma, cardiovascular conditions, and nephropathies; also orthopedic, nerve, and other branches of surgery.

Certain cases of neuro-psychiatric patients likewise require certain classes of hospitals. We are operating one hospital for the care of epileptics and two hospitals for neuropsychoses and other hospitals for insane. It is almost impossible to indicate more clearly in a letter the care given in many of these cases.

With regard to your question as to the number of hospitals in New York State treating and caring for soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war, you are advised that there are six Public Health Service hospitals now operating in the State of New York. (See attached census report sheet.) The number of private hospitals with which the Government has contracted to care for ex-service men is 203; additional information concerning contract hospitals could best be secured from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, room No. 1007.

For the Surgeon General:

Respectfully,

J. D. LONG, Surgeon,
Executive Officer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. Section 313 of the war risk insurance act as amended is hereby amended by adding thereto, immediately following subsection (2) thereof, a new subsection to be known as subsection (2a) and to read as follows:

"(2a) The veterans' bureau is hereby authorized to pay the beneficiary or other person or persons in whose name an action may have been commenced or prosecuted, and to all witnesses in such action, fees and mileage, the same as is now paid and allowed to witnesses in the United States courts, in going to, remaining at, and returning from place of trial, and without any regard to whether the action, if any, is brought or prosecuted in a court of the United States or some other court.

"In all cases of assignment of causes of action under this section, whether the assignment be heretofore or hereafter made, where it shall appear to the director to be to the best interests of the beneficiary so to do, the director, acting for and in the name of the United States, may assign the cause of action back to the beneficiary or to his personal representatives."

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CABLE: Page 17, line 13, insert as a new section:

"SEC. 21½. That section 401 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended by adding thereto the following: 'Provided further, That John I. Eopolucci, an enlisted sailor and member of the armed guard crew of the steamship Aztec, shall be deemed to have been granted insurance in the sum of $5,000 permitted under the war risk insurance act.'"

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that an amendment of that character would not be in order at this time when amendments perfecting the text are being considered.

Mr. ROGERS. I have an amendment to offer as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. Do any other gentlemen desire to offer amendments to perfect the text? If not, the gentleman from Ohio may offer his amendment.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to honor the first member of the United States Navy to lose his life during the World War. The amendment seeks to carry out the intent of the American people by giving to his widowed mother, who is a resident of the District of Columbia, a policy of insurance.

By section 401 of the war risk insurance act, every sailor, soldier, and marine in the service of his country on the 6th day of April, 1917, or thereafter, who did not have an opportunity to apply for and receive a policy of insurance and who dies in active service, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance.

John I. Eopolucci served his country faithfully and well, enlisting in the United States Navy in 1907 as an apprentice seaman. He was advanced and promoted from time to time by personal merit to the office of boatswain's mate, first class, on the U. S. S. Dolphin, the boat used exclusively for the Secretary of the Navy. Just prior to the declaration of war, by an order of the Secretary of the Navy and at the direction of the President of the United States, John I. Eopolucci was transferred from the Dolphin to a merchant ship known as the Aztec. He with 11 other United States sailors acted as an armed guard crew to that vessel, under Commander Gresham of the United States Navy.

On April 1, 1917, when the Aztec was off the coast of France, it was torpedoed or mined. Commander Gresham was the last man to leave the Aztec and he saw Eopolucci seeking to assist the sailors of the Aztec into a lifeboat, pulling safely away from the ship. Commander Gresham, with all of the other members of the armed guard crew, left in another lifeboat and were picked up about 2.30 a. m., April 2, 1917. In Eopolucci's lifeboat there were emergency rations and water, and so far as evidence is concerned no exact date of death can be ascertained, but the records at the Navy Department show the date to be April 1, 1917. The war risk insurance act was effective April 6, 1917, the day war was declared against the German Government. Therefore, Eopolucci's widowed mother can not file her application and obtain the benefit of the war risk insurance act and become a beneficiary, as the record shows her son John died April 1. John was her main support and he had contributed from each pay he received as a sailor to aid her in the maintenance of life. He is the only sailor of the Navy who never had a chance to apply for or under the act is deemed to have applied for insurance.

The real intent of the American people and of Congress, when the war risk insurance act went into effect, was to aid and care for the dependents of those who lost their lives in the service during the World War. It is for that purpose I rise to-day and offer this amendment. A precedent for this amendment was established when a preceding Congress determined that each officer and enlisted man attached to the U. S. S. Cyclops on the 4th day of March, 1918, and every officer and enlisted man who on said date was a passenger on said vessel, shall be deemed to have been granted insurance in the sum of $5,000, permitted under the war risk insurance act. The Cyclops, as you all may know, has never been accounted for, nor has any reason, so far as I know, been determined for her disappearance. There are no records to show how the men on that vessel lost their lives, but Congress did grant to their dependents policies of insurance.

Eopolucci's record is one of the best in the Navy. His physical condition was good, and the fact that he had been advanced so often shows that he was serving the Nation courageously and well. These men are entitled to the highest consideration that it is possible to give them by an act of Congress. So also should the widowed mother of this man receive some compensation for the loss of her son and the support he was giving her. As the facts stand to-day she has lost her son in the great cause and is receiving no compensation for her sacrifice.

By the adoption of this amendment, the Members of Congress can indicate their appreciation for the sacrifice this sailor made, honor his memory, and grant to the one who mourns his loss some slight reward that she is justly entitled to. There is no actual proof that John I. Eopolucci did not survive until April 6, 1917.

I therefore respectfully submit that the spirit of fair play that lies in the hearts of all American people, the desire and intent to right all wrong, and the wish to heal the wounds of the war should cause the Members to-day to adopt the amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did this accident or this death occur on April 1, 1917?

Mr. CABLE. I am glad the gentleman asked the question. No one knows when the death occurred. This man was last seen in a lifeboat pulling away from the Aztec on April 1, 1917, about 11 o'clock at night. Nothing was ever seen of the man afterwards. In that lifeboat there were emergency rations and a supply of water. Nothing has been known of it since. But the man was last seen on April 1.

If the Chair please, there is no more important question before this House to-day than the taking care of a man who gave his life for his country, particularly a man who never had any chance to take out insurance, and who has a widowed mother in the District of Columbia who needs that help.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the Chair hear me? The Chair made a statement that would absolutely preclude the offering of amendments to section 401, because the next section of this bill to which there is an amendment is section 402. This morning——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cross that bridge when he comes to it.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the Chair permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I have an amendment, and I think the gentleman from Iowa has another amendment to section 401. The prior section has been read and passed. The next section about to be read is 402. In the interest of orderly procedure and in the interest of having this bill arranged in its proper chronological order, is it not, in the view of the Chair, proper to offer an amendment to section 401, provided that the amendment offered is germane and otherwise in order?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Germane to the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. If section 402 should be read, which it would be if the Chair did not allow an amendment to section 401 to be offered at this time, the point of order which was made this morning against the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] would hold. The Chair would very naturally say that the proper place for the insertion of an amendment to 401 had been passed, and therefore he would be bound to sustain that point of order. I submit that if section 401 is to be susceptible of amendment at all, it ought to be amended at this point and at no other.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to submit to the Chair an argument against the propriety of considering amendments to other sections of the war risk insurance act than those that are not included in the bill under consideration. I question very seriously whether under the rules of the House it is in order on a bill such as this, even though it presents amendments to various sections of the war risk insurance act, to present amendments like the one offered this morning by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] or like the one now proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] to this bill when such sections are not under consideration in the bill as reported. This is a large question that I do not believe has been passed upon except once, to my recollection, in the House. The question is, when a bill is presented like this one, amending, say, two, three, or four specific sections of a certain measure which contains perhaps a dozen sections, whether it is in order for any Member to offer an amendment to a section that has not been included for change. I take it that the reason for the rule of the House based on the relation of germaneness to the subject matter under consideration by the House is that it is founded on the idea that it is intended to dispatch the legislation under consideration, and for the further reason of protecting the House in the consideration of the proposed legislation by having the proposed legislation given consideration first by a committee as to whether it should be considered by the House at all. Otherwise there would be no logic in the rule which has been followed that when a Senate bill is presented to the House and referred to a committee for consideration, even that committee has no power to report any amendment except one that is germane to the bill, even though it may have authority to report legislation of a different character.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not now. I call the attention of the Chairman to a specific ruling by Speaker Clark when this very question was up for consideration, in which the Speaker upheld the contention of those protesting against the innovation attempted here. The point was contested by Messrs. Sherley, Fitzgerald, and myself, and also on the other side in support by Mr. CRISP. The bill under consideration then was a Post Office appropriation bill in which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had brought into the House substantive legislation amending three sections of the Criminal Code. When the bill came back into the House the gentleman from California, Mr. Randall, offered a motion to recommit that had relation to other sections of the Criminal Code but did not have any direct relation to the provision on which he sought to hang his amendment.

The section of the Criminal Code that was amended and a part of the bill under consideration was section 215. That related exclusively to preventing the use of the mails for fraud. Mr. Randall offered an amendment to forbid the use of the mails in the sending of literature relating to liquor of any kind or any kind of advertisement relating to the sale of liquor. Although that amendment would have been in order to another section of the Criminal Code, but which, however, was not attempted to be reviewed and was not under consideration by the House in the amendments reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, after elaborate argument by Messrs. Fitzgerald, Sherley, CRISP, and myself the Speaker held that it was not germane to the subject matter under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going to indulge in this practice that when the committee brings in a bill amending, say, two sections of a law that comprises 20 or 30 sections, that because there is an amendment of two sections it opens up for consideration every section in the original law, amendments to other sections which have no relation to the section attempted to be amended by the bill presented by the committee, then we put behind us that safeguard and protection which is necessary in legislation—that before legislation is considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it must first be considered by a committee of the House.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. On the question of germaneness, there are seven or eight specific sections in title 2 relating to insurance. There are amendments sought to be offered here at this place relating to insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair will not pass on the question whether the amendment to section 401 if germane otherwise would be in order. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio proposes to amend a general provision of the law by the addition of a specific provision relating to one person apparently within the excluded class. The Chair thinks that such an amendment is not in order, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 13, insert the following as a new section:
"SEC. 21½. Section 401 of the war risk insurance act, as amended, is hereby further amended by adding at the end of said section the following language:
"'Provided further, That any person in the active service who while in such service subsequent to the 6th day of April, 1917, and prior to the 6th day of October, 1917, became totally and permanently disabled without having applied for insurance shall be deemed to have been granted insurance in the sum of $10,000, payments thereafter to be made in accordance with existing laws and regulations.'"

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that the proposed amendment is not germane to Title II of the bill, because of the fact that Title II of the bill amends certain sections of Title IV of the original Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and this goes outside of those sections and makes a new section. I make that point of order on the ground stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that it is not germane to the section we have under consideration.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, dealing first with the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana, which the Chair in his last ruling expressly left undetermined, I desire to call the Chair's attention to the rather extraordinary breadth of the amendments carried in Title II of the bill before the House. There are 15 different sections in Title II, each comprising a separate amendment to the existing war risk laws. The existing war risk laws are in four parts. Part 1 deals with one phase of the war risk activities, part 2 with another, part 3 with another, and part 4 with another. Every one of these four parts of the war risk laws is amended by the pending Sweet bill. Section 15 amends section 29; section 16 amends section 31—both in the first part of the war risk law. Section 17 amends a section in the second part. Sections 18 to 21, inclusive, amend the third part. Then we come to section 22, which amends section 402 of the war risk act.

The last eight sections of the bill all amend part 4 of the war risk insurance law. Part 4 of the war risk insurance law relates to insurance. While the bill before the House has gone very far in amending other parts of the existing law, part 4 of the war risk law is amended with particular freedom as shown by the fact that out of the 15 sections carried in title 2 of the pending bill, 8 relate to insurance operations of the war risk law and amendments.

I shall not attempt to describe in detail to the Chair, because he is familiar with them, what those sections provide or the extent to which these last sections to the pending bill vitally affect existing war risk insurance legislation. They cover many fields and phases of existing law. To me it would be an absurdity and an anomaly if it rested solely with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this House to decide what amendments should be introduced, what portions of the war risk insurance act could be dealt with, and not allow the House to consider other equally vital and important phases of the law. Of course, I am familiar with the rule that where a committee proposes a single change in a law under color of amendment, there can not be proposed a change in another portion of the law. But here we have a case where the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce proposes a bill which changes the war risk laws in a great many respects.

The bill adds new sections of an entirely irrelevant character, adding subject matter which had not before been contemplated in the war risk law. My amendment is germane at this point, because it is the only point in the bill where it could be offered. It is germane as an amendment to another section because surely the power of the House must extend to a sixteenth section when the proposal is made to amend 15 sections. It is germane as to subject matter, because it is precisely in line with the substance of section 401.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is a new section to the Bureau of War Risk bill. It presents a different question than would be presented——

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, my amendment is a proviso to an existing section of the war risk bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman number it 401½?

Mr. ROGERS. No. I provide——

Section 401 of the war risk insurance act as modified by section 12 of the act entitled an act to amend, etc., is hereby further amended, by adding at the end of said section the following language: Provided further—

And so forth.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts presents clearly the question of whether it shall be germane to leave the sections that are proposed to be amended, bring in an entirely new section of the bill, and bring it in by way of amendment. I have not been able to turn to them, but there have been certain rulings holding that when a number of sections are amended in the bill, then you can on the floor of the House, or in committee, offer an amendment to repeal the entire law. It is an analogy to that ruling that it has sometimes been contended that whenever more than one section is dealt with you can, therefore, amend any other section. That is not at all an absolute rule, and it has been qualified by a number of decisions and those decisions hold that when the sections that are proposed to be amended deal with the entire substance, so that the heart of the legislation is being considered, then it does open up the entire matter. But it can not be contended that if the sections of the Civil Code, for instance, were to be amended, that thereby it would open up the entire Civil Code for amendment. It seems to me it would be a bad precedent to hold that merely because there were more than two sections being dealt with, therefore it opens up the entire field covered by the war risk act.

The CHAIRMAN. It is always difficult to lay down a general rule with respect to admissibility of amendments which can be applied in every instance without question of doubt or without exception. The Chair is of opinion that, generally, it has been held that an amendment offered as a new section must be germane to the preceding section, but the Chair thinks that the rule is better stated by saying that the new section must be germane to the bill at the place at which it is offered. The Chair thinks that if the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is in order at all, it is in order at the place at which he offered it.

The next question that arises is whether or not any amendment to section 401 of the war risk insurance act, which is not amended by the bill, as reported by the committee, is in order. The Chair confesses to having a considerable degree of difficulty with that question. The Chair does not think that the general rule can be laid down that where several portions of a law are amended by a bill reported by a committee, it is not in any case in order to amend another section of the bill not included in the bill reported by the committee, nor does the Chair think that the opposite rule can be laid down and rigidly applied in every instance. The Chair thinks that a question of this kind must be determined in every instance in the light of the facts which are presented in the case.

In the particular case under consideration it appears that the committee has reported a bill which amends several sections of Title IV of the bill in various particulars. The Chair does not feel that he can hold that no amendment to a section not dealt with by the committee is in order. The question, therefore, comes down to whether or not the particular amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts is germane to section 401, if any amendment to that section is permitted.

The Chair thinks that the amendment proposed is clearly germane to that section, and the Chair thinks that the general character of the amendments proposed by the committee to various sections of Title IV is such that it is in order to amend section 401 in a germane way, even though that particular section is not dealt with by the committee or by the bill. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is extremely simple, and it may perhaps be said to be rather limited in its application. Gentlemen will recall that we declared war on the 6th day of April, 1917. The first war-risk law was enacted on the 6th day of October, 1917. Consequently there was an interval between those two dates of exactly six months. During that time we raised an Army. We sent divisions overseas. Our men were engaged in training in this country and, to a limited extent, in conflict across the ocean. Thirty-nine men were totally and permanently disabled during those six months. Just 39 men out of the millions of men whom we sent forth were totally and permanently disabled before October 6, 1917. Of course, they had had no opportunity to take out war-risk insurance, because the war-risk insurance law had not been passed when they were wounded. After it had been passed they were by hypothesis totally and permanently disabled, so that they were not entitled to take out insurance. Congress has recognized that those men who went early and saw their duty before the rest are entitled to special treatment and, if you like, special favor. Congress has bestowed upon those men what is called automatic insurance of $25 a month. That represents a $4,000 insurance policy. My amendment does this, and this only: It provides that as to those 39 men who are totally and permanently disabled to-day as a result of their war service, men who could not have taken out insurance because they never had the opportunity, we shall give them a $10,000 insurance policy instead of a $4,000 insurance policy.

That is all that it does. Now, why should we do this? Why should we go further than we have?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Before the gentleman leaves the facts, were any killed between that period?

Mr. ROGERS. There was a considerable number killed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And their dependents would also get insurance?

Mr. ROGERS. No; my amendment is limited to those who became totally and permanently disabled.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I did not observe the reading.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the gentleman will yield, of course quite a number died from this cause or that cause during the six months.

Mr. ROGERS. That is exactly the question which the gentleman from Illinois has put.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I thought he only asked with reference to those killed, and I referred to those who died from diseases.

Mr. ROGERS. That is true.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is involved and involved equitably with the question not only of taking care of those totally and permanently disabled, but also taking care of the dependents of those who died from disease or who were killed.

Mr. ROGERS. I am not quite so sure of the equity. Insurance is primarily contractual. These men are wrecks of their old selves. They are totally and permanently disabled. I am not quite sure whether the same kind of equity is carried on to the families of men who died before they had a chance to take out this insurance. The question comes, of course, in this case what these 39 men would have done if they had had a chance to take out the insurance.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will yield, because I think it is important to discuss it, what about the men who were disabled within say 120 days, the period used in the law after October 6, who knew nothing about any insurance at all? Are they on a different plane?

Mr. ROGERS. I personally should like to take care of those men also; but we will have to draw the line somewhere, and it was suggested to me in the preparation of this amendment that the date when the war risk insurance law was enacted was as good an arbitrary date as we could select.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But that is no good to the man who did not know.

Mr. ROGERS. That is true, and personally I have no objection to carrying it further——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for two minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to suggest to the committee why, in my judgment, this gratuity, if you want to call it that, is just. We had about four and three-quarter millions of men in the military and naval services during the war. All but about 100,000 of those men actually took out insurance—99 per cent of all the men who had the opportunity to take out insurance unquestionably did so. Ninety-seven per cent of the total enrollment actually did take out insurance. The presumption is, of course, that these 39 would have taken out insurance if they had had an opportunity, and if they were denied the chance it was not their fault. Shall we penalize them because they saw their duty early? Surely now, when they have become maimed and crippled for life they ought to have the protection of insurance.

Mr. MILLS. What was the average insurance?

Mr. ROGERS. The average insurance was just about $9,000, which is another reason, as I see it, why the present automatic insurance of $4,000 is clearly inadequate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ROGERS) there were—ayes 46, noes 57.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Sixteen gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, after line 13, insert a new section, as follows:

"That that part of the second sentence of section 401 of the war risk insurance act as amended in section 12 of 'An act to amend and modify the war risk insurance act,' approved December 24, 1919, which reads as follows:

"'Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who, while in such service, and before the expiration of 120 days after October 15, 1917, or 120 days after entrance into or employment in the active service, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life to monthly installments of $25 each,'" is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who, while in such service, has become totally and permanently disabled, or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each.'"

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I want to take up a few minutes of the time of this body to explain the effect of the amendment I just offered. If I may have the attention of members of the committee in charge of this bill, and if they can get themselves in a frame of mind to forget for a few minutes the pride that most committees have in putting through their bills without amendments, I believe I can convince them of the justness of my amendment, and they will probably accept it.

Before I proceed further I wish to state to the members of the committee having charge of this bill that if I make a misstatement, either of fact or of law, I ask that some gentleman on the committee correct me. Congress declared war April 6, 1917. The first war risk insurance act for the benefit of the service men was passed October 6, 1917. Six months intervened between the passage of the war declaration and this war risk insurance act. The war risk insurance act, which became a law on October 6, 1917, provided for two kinds of insurance.

One was contract insurance, which had to be applied for and signed up for, and could be taken out to the extent of $10,000. As I understand it, nearly every soldier and sailor who took out any contract insurance took the maximum amount of $10,000.

The other kind of insurance that was provided for in this act was automatic insurance. Automatic insurance provided for in the act of October 6, 1917, covered all persons in the service from the date of the declaration of war on April 6, 1917, until 120 days after October 15, 1917, which protected all persons in the service up to February 12, 1918. On February 12, 1918, the doors to automatic insurance were closed, figuratively speaking, and they were not opened again until over a year after the armistice, to wit, December 24, 1919. The effect of this was that between February 12, 1918, to November 11, 1918, the date of the armistice, all persons who died or became permanently and totally disabled in the service and who did not have contract insurance had no insurance whatever.

On December 24, 1919, what is commonly known as the Sweet bill was enacted into law. This act, by retroactive legislation, went back and opened the doors to automatic insurance to certain classes of men. Prior to this act, as I have stated before, the doors to automatic insurance were closed on February 12, 1918, and after that date no person in the service was protected by automatic insurance during the rest of the time that the war continued. The Sweet bill, which became a law December 24, 1919, by retroactive legislation, gave the benefits of automatic insurance to all men for 120 days after they came into the service. The effect of this was that persons who entered the service on or after February 12, 1918, were given 120 days' protection by automatic insurance, a protection which they did not have while they were actually in the service. Another class of men were covered by automatic insurance, by retroactive legislation, in the Sweet bill. During the war the men had no protection between the time they were ordered by the local draft board to report and the time they were accepted at the mobilization camp. If something happened to these men between the place they reported to the local draft board and the mobilization camp and final acceptance, they were covered by this retroactive legislation passed over a year after the war closed. And to-day, in the second section of title 2 of this bill, you give the benefits of automatic insurance to still another class of men—that is, men who tried to enlist, usually in some special service in the War or Navy Department. These men would go to an enlisting officer and apply for some special service. They were told by the enlisting officer that the place they wanted was not then available. They were provisionally accepted and directed to go home and wait until called. If something happened to these men while they were at home or elsewhere awaiting orders, you give them automatic insurance, and you do more than that——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I may not take up the five minutes, but I do want to make plain to the gentlemen who are here in the House the effects of my amendment, and I want to help the committee perfect this bill. I want to be fair and just to all the men who were in the service. The men that would be covered and protected by automatic insurance by my amendment are just as worthy as the men that have been given the benefits of automatic insurance by retroactive legislation passed as amendments after the close of the war to the war risk insurance act. They are just as worthy as the men who were taken care of by extending the automatic insurance for 120 days in the first Sweet bill, or the men who were taken from the local boards to the mobilization camps—and while that was going on something happened to them—or the men referred to in the second amendment of Title 2 in this bill, which was allowed to pass without objection, men who applied for special service in the Navy or the Army, and while they were waiting to be called something happened to them. You here to-day not only gave them the benefits of automatic insurance but if, pending that time they were waiting to be called, they applied for contract insurance, you validate those policies. You also provide in that section that those men who were provisionally accepted shall be considered in the active service. There is a question in my mind whether that section does not entitle them to an honorable discharge, even though they were never finally accepted, and thus possibly entitle them also to membership in organizations of ex-service men. But I am getting off the main purpose of my amendment. I am simply attempting to show by contrast the merit of the class of cases which will be benefited by my amendment—that is, the men who died or were permanently disabled in the service between February 12, 1918, and November 11, 1918, and who, through no fault of their own, did not have contract insurance.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I will.

Mr. SWEET. In order that we may get the full scope of the gentleman's amendment, I would like to ask this question: Now, is it the purpose of the amendment to extend automatic insurance to all persons who were a part of the Army between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Wait right there. All persons in the service were covered by automatic insurance between April 6, 1917, and February 12, 1918, by the act of October 6, 1917, so that my amendment would simply extend the benefits of automatic insurance to all men in the service from February 12, 1918, to November 11, 1918.

Mr. SWEET. But that would give automatic insurance to all men who died or were totally disabled between those dates who had not contract insurance. Is that true?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SWEET. What would that cost the Government?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, I will tell you this. The more men that there were who died or were permanently disabled between those two dates and who had no contract insurance, the more it would cost the Government. The more of such men that there are the more Members in this House that would be for my amendment. Up to this moment, since this bill has been under consideration, I am the only Member who has gotten up to plead the cause of the men who, without contract insurance, died or became totally disabled between February 12, 1918, and November 11, 1918. If there were 20 Members here on the floor of this House having such cases in their districts there would be no question about my amendment being adopted. But I will tell you, gentlemen, frankly, that I have tried to get the figures from the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and they tell me they can not get them. In a letter to me the director of that bureau states that the total number of automatic insurance awards granted for death and total disability between February 12, 1918, and November 11, 1918, is only 106. I do not think that there are a great many cases that would be covered by my amendment. If there were many such cases there would be a great demand for this legislation. I am not asking for this legislation because there are many or few persons to be benefited thereby. I am asking for this legislation because I think it is just, and more just, if I may use that comparison, than the cases heretofore taken care of by retroactive legislation, and further, because, so far as my information goes, this amendment would only take care of the cases of men who died upon the battle fields of France or became totally disabled over there, and who were in the service before the first war risk insurance act was passed on October 6, 1917, and so far as the records of the War and Navy Departments show they never refused contract insurance, nor had it presented to them.

Mr. SWEET. It grants every man insurance during that period automatically?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; and it ought to.

Mr. SWEET. Every man who did not take out contract insurance?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; that is the effect of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, under leave granted all Members to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill for five legislative days, I submit for printing in the RECORD a letter addressed by me to the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the answer thereto, both of which are self-explanatory:

APRIL 13, 1921.

Director R. G. CHOLMELEY-JONES,
Bureau of War Risk Insurance, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A little over a year ago I called upon your bureau to give me information relative to the number of men who died or were permanently disabled in the service between the dates of February 12, 1918, and November 11, 1918, and who had no insurance, either contract or automatic. You ought to have this information by this time and I am very anxious to secure it.

Awaiting an early answer, I am,
Very truly, yours,

C. W. RAMSEYER.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 4, 1921.

Hon. C. W. RAMSEYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In reply to your letter of April 13, it is impossible to give the number of men who died or were permanently disabled in the service between the dates of February 12 and November 11, 1918, and who carried no insurance. The best information available is contained in the following statements:

The total number of deaths in all branches of the service between Feb. 12 and Nov. 11, 1918 98,782

The total number of men discharged with disability between Feb. 12 and Nov. 11, 1918 129,494

These figures were obtained from the War and Navy Departments and it is impossible to tell the degree of disability without a tabulation of each individual case.

The total number of insurance death awards granted by the bureau from February, 1918, to November, 1918 100,304

Of this number 99,270 were for contract insurance and 103 for automatic insurance.

The total number of insurance awards granted by the bureau for permanent total disability from February, 1918, to November, 1918 260

Of this number, 257 were for contract and 3 for automatic insurance.

Assuring you that it is a pleasure to furnish you with the foregoing information, I am,

Very sincerely,

C. R. FORBES, Director.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that the temper of the House is such that this amendment may not get the consideration it deserves, so I am going to ask as a special favor of the House that Members give this matter some consideration. I do it because I know of instances in my own company where men were killed in action and their widows or their dependent mothers have not received one cent from the Government. Now, is not that fact worthy at least of some consideration, even if the temper of the House is such that gentlemen do not want to consider these amendments?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I regret I can not; I have only five minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Did they not receive compensation in those cases?

Mr. FISH. They received no insurance whatsoever. Let me finish my statement. The question has been asked, How many does this apply to? You can answer approximately how many it will apply to. Ninety-five per cent in the Army took out insurance; 95 per cent of 4,800,000. Five per cent did not take it out; somewhere around 240,000. Three per cent of those were casualties, about 7,200, and of those, 3,600—probably not half—had dependents.

Now, going back to this particular case, our regiment started to go over in October, 1917, before this insurance feature went into effect. The officers knew practically nothing about it, and the men knew less than nothing. When the regiment went over there, they were attached to the French Army, where they had no opportunity to get any information in regard to insurance. A number of the men, three alone in my own company, were killed without carrying any insurance.

Now, are you going to penalize the dependent mothers or the dependent wives of these soldiers because they did not take out insurance for one cause or another? Are you going to penalize them because when alive they did not take out insurance? Are you going to penalize the wives or the widows of the men who were killed on the front line of battle? That is why I ask your indulgence to consider this amendment.

Now, inasmuch as I have got but a few moments left, I shall point out another fact, and that is that no other Government in the world compelled its soldiers to deduct money from their pay to carry insurance that only went into effect when they were killed or were totally disabled. I hope if there is ever another war we will not do such a thing again. It is almost impossible for the clerk of a company to keep the books properly, deducting each month from the pay of the men to carry insurance in favor of their families if they should die in the service of their country. I hope we shall never do it again, but, if necessary, that the Government will provide liberally for the dependent wives and mothers of those men who paid the supreme sacrifice. Now, I am pleading for these 3,600 men, and asking that their dependent wife or mother be given automatic insurance amounting to $4,000 each; not the full amount of $10,000 which they should have taken out, but $4,000, which would include them under the automatic feature which included all the rest for 120 days.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. How much was the pay of the English, French, or Italian soldier, and how much could be deducted from the pay?

Mr. FISH. I will answer that. The English Government and the French Government and the Italian Government provided for the dependent mother and the dependent wife in every instance, and the English Government provided much more liberally, you may be surprised to know, than we did in this country, even with the insurance.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. FISH. The purpose of this amendment is to give Congress an opportunity to do something in behalf of these sorrowing dependents of the men who were killed or died in service who did not carry insurance, whether from lack of opportunity or any other reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 59.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. RAMSEYER and Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STAFFORD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 2428. An act granting certain lands to Converse County, Wyo., for a public park;

H. R. 2466. An act to constitute Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, a port of entry and to extend to said port the privileges of section 7 of an act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes";

H. R. 3018. An act granting the consent of Congress to H. H. Haynes to construct a dike across Mud Slough on Isthmus Inlet, in section 23, township 26 south, range 13 west, of Willamette meridian in Oregon; and

H. R. 5223. An act to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in Riverside County, Calif.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. Section 404 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 404. During the period of the war and thereafter until converted the insurance shall be term insurance for successive terms of one year each. Not later than five years after the date of the termination of the war as declared by proclamation of the President of the United States the term insurance shall be converted, without medical examination, into such form or forms of insurance as may be prescribed by regulations and as the insured may request. Regulations shall provide for the right to convert into ordinary life, 20-payment life, endowment maturing at age 62, and into other usual forms of insurance, and shall prescribe the time and method of payment of the premiums thereon, but payments of premiums in advance shall not be required for periods of more than one month each and may be deducted from the pay or deposit of the insured or be otherwise made at his election.

"In case where an insured whose yearly renewable term insurance has matured by reason of total permanent disability is found and declared to be no longer permanently and totally disabled, and where the insured is required under regulations to renew payment of premiums on said term insurance, and where this contingency is extended beyond the five-year period during which said yearly renewable term insurance otherwise must be converted, there shall be given such insured an additional period of two years from the date on which he is required to renew payment of premiums in which to convert said term insurance as hereinbefore provided."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Gentlemen of the committee, we are nearing the end of this bill. I feel that the thanks of the Committee of the Whole are due to the committee in charge of this legislation. It is a great constructive and remedial measure. The distinguished gentleman from my own State [Mr. RAYBURN] had charge of the first legislation along this line that was adopted by this Congress, the bill creating the War Risk Bureau, and of the amendments to the original bill while my party was in control here. He and his colleagues on this committee have worked with great earnestness and ability for the soldiers of the late war. The gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. SWEET] and the chairman of the committee reporting the bill [Mr. WINSLOW] are due the gratitude of the disabled soldiers of the country.

There is only one point at which I have not been able to agree with or yield to the committee, and that is with reference to section 6 of the bill. It is the desire of those who have not been in agreement with the committee to have a straight vote on the proposition as to whether or not the figures "140" shall be substituted for the figures "50" on page 5, section 6, of the bill.

I submit to the judgment of the Committee of the Whole that the figures "140" ought to be substituted for the figures "50" as they appear in the bill. I hesitate to make the suggestion against the judgment of the committee having the bill in charge. I make it a rule whenever I possibly can do so to follow the committee, especially a committee as able as this one and that has manifested the interest in the soldiers which the members of this committee have manifested. What the soldiers have received has come from this committee. The committee are entitled to great credit for the manner in which they have undertaken to deal with the first duty which this Government owes to the men who have been in the service—the duty to the disabled. The men who returned to this country strong and vigorous after the war have earned the lasting gratitude of the country and are entitled to whatever it can do for them, but the men who deserve most and who deserve first at the hands of their country are the men whose hopes have been wiped out in the service which they rendered to the country.

This great Nation ought to do every single thing within its power for the boys who left our shores in all the vigor of their manhood and who came back here broken and ruined from the effects of their service.

Now, coming right down to the point, we all understand that the great difficulty about the situation of the disabled soldiers arises out of the fact that some of the crippled, disabled men have not been able to get in touch with the machinery which a grateful Government has established for their protection, rehabilitation, and maintenance. That is the theory, as I understand, upon which the 50 suboffices are to be established. But we are dealing with men who are not in full vigor and strength, that they are invalids, crippled men, and incapacitated men, and if there be need for any I do not believe 50 will be enough. Here is the weak spot, as I understand it, in everything that the Government has undertaken to do for its disabled soldiers. The poor fellow is often unable to reach the hand which the Government is extending toward him. That is why we should give him especial consideration and put it within the discretion of the director to establish more than 50 of these suboffices, if necessary, in order that one may be not too far from the disabled soldiers. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RHODES. Page 19, line 3, after the period insert the following: "No insurance shall be held to have lapsed during such time as any war-service bonus may have been due and unpaid the insured by the United States, under section 1406 of the act approved February 24, 1919 (40 Stats. L., p. 1151), in any sum equal to or in excess of the amount of premium or premiums due and unpaid by the insured, unless the insured otherwise elects in writing; Provided further, that this paragraph shall be deemed to become effective as of February 24, 1919, but shall be effective in no case where the insured has been paid such war-service bonus."

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROACH. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, and I should like to inquire whether it is proper to offer it at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] is entitled to debate his amendment for five minutes before the amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on last Friday I gave the House notice that when this section in the bill was reached under the 5-minute rule, I should offer an amendment in order to meet a situation which I detailed at that time.

During the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule we have heard much said with regard to the various provisions of this splendid piece of legislation. Every conceivable phase of the proposition has been touched upon at some angle or another. The question this amendment seeks to reach is this. This is a very meritorious and exceptional class of cases. Walter Warren Parsons, an honorably discharged soldier in my district, carried $10,000 insurance at the time of his discharge. Within four months of the date of his discharge he died. During that period of four months he failed to pay his insurance premium, but he had never received his $60 bonus. Therefore the father, James Parsons, the beneficiary under the policy, was denied the insurance by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance upon the ground that the $60 bonus money could not be applied toward the payment of the premium due, which amounted to about $28.

Mr. Chairman, I inquired at the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and was informed on the 3d day of this month that there were about 60 known cases in the United States in which at the time of the death of the soldier the bonus money had not been paid, and has never been paid. Therefore at the time of the death of this soldier the Government of the United States owed him more money than he owed the Government on account of the arrearage of insurance premium. He owed the Government $28, and the Government owed him $60.

The amendment which I propose and which is offered to section 404 of the original war risk insurance act has for its object the accomplishment of but one purpose, namely, to apply the unpaid bonus money toward the payment of premiums due and unpaid at the time of the death of the soldier. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that during all the history of war risk insurance legislation this section 404 has never been amended up to the present time. It is a further fact, Mr. Chairman, that between the effective date of the soldiers' bonus act, which was February 24, 1919, and September 14, 1920, the date the Comptroller of the Treasury rendered the opinion in which he held that the bonus could not be applied to the payment of premiums, the $60 bonus money was so applied. In other words, for 17 months the $60 bonus money was applied toward the payment of unpaid premiums in such cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RHODES. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to speak for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES. I would like to have the chairman of the committee hear me on this point. If this amendment prevails it does nothing more than to restore the principle which was in effect between the date of the bonus act and the date of the rendering of the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury. I submit that if it was right to have the $60 bonus money applied as a payment to the discharge of the premium between those dates, it is right to so apply it now. This is a class of cases that does not deal with soldiers who have lost arms or limbs, that we have been told about, or the soldier who may have lost both eyes. Gentlemen, this amendment applies to the beneficiary, who is the wife, the child, the father, or the mother, the individuals who made a contribution to the war in flesh and blood.

In the particular case I have in mind, this boy was the son of a poor laboring man. He did not have the money with which to pay the insurance premium. The father is now an old man in feeble health, and if the same principle should be applied from this time forward which was applied during the 17 months that passed between February 24, 1919, and September 19, 1920, this old man would be entitled to the benefits of this insurance. This amendment reaches a most meritorious class of cases, and inasmuch as the object of the pending bill seems to be to make existing law more generous and more just, I want to appeal to you gentlemen to support my amendment in order that the bill may be more complete, a better, and a more perfect piece of legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri has most effectively and eloquently set forth what he believes to be the needs of this particular case. He informs the House that, as far as he has been able to ascertain, there are something like 69 cases throughout the country. Gentlemen of the House, if this amendment is adopted it will mean that the Government will pay out in insurance the sum of $690,000, and it will pay it out notwithstanding the fact that the holders of these insurance policies for some reason or other did not choose to continue them.

Here is a case where a man permits his Government insurance policy to lapse by nonpayment of premiums. So far as we know, he does this for reasons that seem perfectly good to him. Later he dies. His beneficiaries, of course, want the insurance reinstated. It means much to them. They, however, should have interested themselves in keeping the policy alive. Why should this be done? The gentleman says because the insured had a $60 bonus claim against the Government which was unpaid at the time when the insurance lapsed and which remained unpaid at the time of the ex-soldier's death.

There is no claim here that this man, or any one of them, at any time requested the Government to apply the bonus in payment of insurance premiums, or that they even indicated to the Government that if the bonus was paid to them they would use the amount to keep up their insurance. If death had not intervened, there would have been no attempt by this man, or any one of them, to apply the bonus to the payment of insurance premiums and thereby reinstate the policy.

If we adopt this amendment, we adopt the principle of involuntary insurance. We compel a man to keep up and maintain his insurance.

This bonus money was the soldier's property. It belonged to him by act of Congress. It rests in the power of no one to take it away from him without his consent. During his lifetime certainly neither the Government nor anyone else besides the service man could have applied the bonus for the payment of insurance premiums or for any other purpose. If the soldier had not died, no one would have been advocating legislation of this kind.

Mr. RHODES. It would not be necessary.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. We would not think of advocating the proposition that a soldier permitting his insurance to lapse and having money coming to him from the Government should have that money belonging to him applied by the Government to the payment of insurance premiums without his expressed wish and consent. Any proposition of that kind would be practically unanimously voted down, but the very moment there is a death where the deceased has permitted his insurance policy to lapse and it is discovered that he had bonus money coming, then the proposition is made that this bonus money should be applied for the reinstatement of the lapsed insurance. Such a policy would reward the beneficiaries of those who lacked diligence equally with those who, because of regard for members of their family, may have sacrificed greatly for the purpose of maintaining this insurance.

Mr. Chairman, there is no end of legislation of this kind if the committee decides to embark upon it and enact this amendment.

Bonus allowance ($60)	249,967,286.28
Total	1,414,263,766.96

NOTE.—The Bureau of War Risk Insurance has received from insurance premiums approximately $388,557,651 up to May 31, 1921, and has disbursed on insurance claims up to May 21, 1921, $215,716,159.77.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES], and before I send it up I want to call attention to the fact that the only change in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is these words are added, "or back pay, travel, and allowance."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to amendment offered by Mr. ROACH: Page 19, line 3, after the period insert the following: "No war-risk insurance shall be held to have lapsed during such time as any war-service bonus may have been due and unpaid the insured by the United States, under section 1406 of the act approved February 24, 1919 (40 Stats. L., p. 1151), or back pay or travel allowance, in any sum equal to or in excess of the amount of premium or premiums due and unpaid by the insured, unless the insured otherwise elects in writing: Provided further, That this paragraph shall be deemed to become effective as of February 24, 1919, but shall be effective in no case where the insured has been paid such war-service bonus, back pay, and travel allowance."

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, it will be noted that the only change in the proposed amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] is that it includes back pay and transportation allowances in connection with the bonus feature advanced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES]. As I recollect, a day or so ago when the gentleman from Missouri called the attention of the House to the fact that he proposed to offer this amendment, the only objection that was suggested to the amendment at that time was that it might operate to cause involuntary insurance, as was mentioned by the gentleman who preceded me on the floor. Evidently he overlooked the provision which provides that the insured shall have the right and privilege to otherwise elect in writing if he so desires. That has the effect to destroy the argument advanced that it compels insurance, whether the insured desires it or not. Further answering the proposition of the gentleman who preceded me that it would cost the Government $690,000, I say that is no argument against this provision, for this reason:

I have in mind this proposition that the Government did for a time rule that this bonus could be applied to the insurance premium, and so applied it, thus leading the insured into a false sense of security that the Government would continue that policy; and, therefore, it is only equitable and fair to the insured that where the insured was thus misled that his policy should not be permitted to lapse. In one case in my district, that of Cecil Alva White, the insured had authorized the Government to so apply any moneys due him to the payment of his premiums. In justice to his dependents, this amendment should be adopted.

They established this practice and carried it on to the extent that they lulled the insured into a sense of belief that that practice was going to be continued, and they thereby were led to believe that the Government was going to protect their policy in that manner. Consequently they did that very thing. Not only that, but I have an instance in my own district in the case of Cecil White, where the Government had been authorized by him to deduct from his bonus and deduct from $19.50 salary owing to him and to deduct from $35 allowance charge, all owing to him by the Government, his premiums. Yet it was not done. This boy was discharged in Washington, and called at the department in person and further authorized them to do that. He returned to his home at Sedalia and died, but his policy lapsed, and the beneficiaries of his policy now are being denied the privilege of that insurance. That is a gross injustice. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH] to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RHODES) there were—ayes 29, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. A new section is hereby added to Article IV of the war risk insurance act to be known as section 406, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 406. Whenever a claim under United States Government life insurance (converted insurance) is to be paid because of the total permanent disability of the insured, or because of the death of the insured as the result of disease or injury traceable to the extra hazard of the military or naval service, as such hazard may be determined by the director, payment shall be made out of the military and naval insurance appropriation. The United States Government life insurance fund shall be reimbursed out of the military and naval insurance appropriation for any payments made out of such fund prior to the passage of this act, on account of claims because of the total permanent disability of the insured or on account of the death of the insured as the result of disease or injury traceable to the hazard of the military or naval service; and the United States Government life insurance fund shall be reimbursed out of the military and naval insurance appropriation for any premiums from the payment of which the insured has been heretofore relieved because of total permanent disability."

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have just received a letter from the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, which I shall ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, June 10, 1921.

Hon. PHIL D. SWING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In reply to your verbal request for my opinion as to the suboffices needed if House bill 6611 receives favorable consideration at the hands of the Congress, I beg to advise you that in my opinion it is imperative that there should be 140 suboffices authorized.

If sufficient suboffices are not authorized I believe that it will be practically impossible for the Government to carry out its established obligation to ex-service men and women.

The suboffices so authorized will not entail a large clerical personnel, nor will they require an additional increase in personnel to those now employed by the rehabilitation agencies of the Government, which will be consolidated and correlated by the provisions of House bill 6611.

Very truly, yours,

C. R. FORBES, Director.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word of praise for the new director, Mr. C. R. Forbes. Although he has been in office only a short time, he has already made a remarkable record of clearing up the congestion of cases that you and I have had called to our attention for a good many months past. He says that he needs this equipment to carry on the work effectively. I believe he is efficient and is desirous of doing what you and the American people want done, which is to get justice carried to the ex-service man as soon as possible. Yesterday you limited the duration of these suboffices to a period of five years. It is provided that he is to use only such number as he finds to be absolutely necessary in order to clear up the congestion. I believe he is not a man who desires to pile up employees. He has already reduced his personnel, and the newspapers the other day carried the announcement that he intended to reduce it further on July 1 by 900 more. I believe he can be intrusted to use not a single additional subofice more than is necessary to get the result you and I want him to get. We hold him responsible for the administration of this law. Let us do our part by furnishing him with the necessary equipment. These suboffices have no power to pay out money or make any award or decision, as was determined yesterday, but they are the investigators, they are the eyes and the ears and the hands of the department. They are essential to the proper administration of the duties of that office. I hope that when the proper time comes the motion to recommit with instructions to increase the number of these suboffices to 140 will be agreed to.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the committee for a moment. The gentleman from California [Mr. SWING], who has just taken his seat, was clearly out of order in speaking to the question to which he did speak. As a matter of courtesy, it was a pleasure to let him go on, but time is running on very rapidly, and hereafter if anyone speaks out of order I shall feel obliged, however reluctantly, to make the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question with reference to section 24. If I understand the reading of this section, it would relieve the War Risk Insurance Bureau from the burden of having to pay claims under converted insurance in total disability cases or death cases out of the funds collected in premiums from the soldiers. I can readily appreciate that a risk growing out of the hazards of war ought not to be paid out of that fund; but if I understand the language in the bill, it means when hereafter any policyholder becomes permanently disabled, whether the disability is the result of his service in war or not, the loss in such case will not be paid out of the war risk insurance fund, but will come out of the Public Treasury. Is my understanding of that provision correct?

Mr. SWEET. That is correct. In order to keep the insurance upon a safe insurance basis.

Mr. BLACK. Why should not the soldiers' premiums take care of permanent disability cases which do not relate to war service?

Mr. SWEET. In the first instance, of course, converted insurance is old-line insurance.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that.

Mr. SWEET. And it would not do to pay it out of that fund.

Mr. BLACK. Why not?

Mr. SWEET. Only in so far as they relate to converted insurance.

Mr. BLACK. If I understand the reading of this, as to such converted policies, whenever the soldier becomes permanently disabled, the Treasury of the United States will pay the liability of the policy rather than pay it out of the war risk insurance premium funds.

I can see why that where the death of a soldier has resulted from the hazards of war and in relation to his military service that it ought to come out of the Treasury of the United States rather than the war risk insurance fund, because it is one of those extra hazards that was not considered in fixing the payment of these premiums. But I do not see any reason why, if a soldier became permanently disabled and the disability does not relate to his services in the war, that his policy should not be paid out of the war risk insurance fund, rather than out of war and Navy insurance funds.

Mr. SWEET. This section, if I read it correctly, says that in case of total permanent disability of the insured or in case of the death of the insured as the result of disease or injury traceable to the extra hazard of the military or naval service——

Mr. BLACK. Exactly; but as I understand the reading of the language of that clause which says "as the result of disease or injury traceable to the extra hazard of the military or naval services" it will only relate to cases of death, and will not relate to permanent disability cases, and for that reason I believe an amendment should be added. I believe it was the intention to relate both classes of cases to extra war hazards, but the language of the bill, as I read it, does not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. A new section is hereby added to Article IV of the war risk insurance act, to be known as section 408, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 408. In the event that all provisions of the rules and regulations other than the requirements as to the physical condition of the applicant for insurance have been complied with, an application for reinstatement of lapsed or canceled yearly renewable term insurance or application for United States Government life insurance (converted insurance) hereafter made may be approved: Provided, That the applicant's disability is the result of an injury or disease or of an aggravation thereof suffered or contracted in the active military or naval service during the World War: Provided further, That the applicant during his lifetime submits proof satisfactory to the director showing the service origin of the disability or aggravation thereof and that the applicant is not totally and permanently disabled. As a condition, however, to the acceptance of an application for the reinstatement of lapsed or canceled yearly renewable term insurance or United States Government life insurance (converted insurance) the applicant shall be required to pay all the back monthly premiums which would have become payable if such insurance had not lapsed, together with interest at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum on each premium from the date said premium is due by the terms of the policy."

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 16, after the word "Policy," strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and the following: "Provided further, That where any soldier has heretofore allowed his insurance to lapse, while suffering from wounds or disease, suffered or contracted in line of service, and was at the time he allowed his said policy to lapse entitled to compensation on account thereof in a sum equal to or in excess of the amount due from him in premiums on his said insurance, and has since died from said wounds or disease, without collecting or making claim for said compensation, or being allowed to reinstate his said policy on account of his physical condition, then and in that event said policy shall not be considered as lapsed, and the veterans' bureau is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the beneficiaries of said soldier under said policy the amount of said insurance in installments as provided by law."

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this section of the bill deals with the proposition of reinstating lapsed insurance of men who are now living and allows them to do it regardless of the condition of their health provided their health was injured by their services in the war. Under the law as it now stands if a man allows his policy of insurance to lapse he is not allowed to reinstate it by offering to pay up the back premiums, notwithstanding the fact that all of his troubles with his health may be due entirely to his war service. Under the law as it now stands if a man at the time he allows his policy to lapse is what they call totally and permanently disabled, then under the law his policy of insurance will not lapse. The cases that I have were two cases of men who contracted tuberculosis in the war. One of them died from tuberculosis 1 year and 14 or 15 days after his discharge. He was discharged from the Army on the 12th of March, 1919, and was suffering from tuberculosis at that time. In July of that year his policy was allowed to lapse. If he had been lying on the flat of his back in some hospital, although he might not have died for more than two years after that time, his policy of insurance would have been kept alive, and notwithstanding the fact that he was suffering from an incurable disease and one that killed him about a year and a half month after his discharge he does not get the benefit of the law passed by the Congress. This amendment of mine does this, that where a soldier has heretofore allowed his insurance to lapse, while suffering from wounds or disease suffered or contracted in line of service, and was at the time he allowed his said policy to lapse, entitled to said compensation on account thereof—that is, on account of the disease or wound that he contracted in line of service—in a sum equal to or in excess of the amount due from him in premiums on his said insurance, and has since died from said wounds or disease without collecting or making claim for said compensation or being allowed to reinstate his said policy on account of his physical condition, then in that event said policy shall not be considered to lapse. I am simply asking you gentlemen to give these men the same standing that you give to the men who had the same disease who were considered as totally permanently disabled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Gentlemen of the committee, I do not like to take up your time on this amendment. Neither do I want to bother you with a speech. However, you will have to admit that I for one have not in the past bothered this House with useless speeches, nor have I ever stood here on the floor for the mere purpose of getting into the RECORD. I am bringing this case before you, gentlemen, knowing that you want to do what is just by those boys who gave their lives to their country. I am asking you to give this matter careful consideration and thereby afford them the same consideration that their brothers received whose dread diseases or wounds happened to be further advanced at the time they allowed their policies to lapse. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I feel that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] is a most meritorious one and should be adopted by the House. It merely provides that in case an insurance policy has lapsed where a soldier has died who was entitled to draw compensation from the Government, and where he has not drawn that compensation, and has not claimed it, that that compensation shall be applied upon the insurance policy and the insurance policy shall be reinstated. It will inure to the benefit of the mother or the wife of the soldier.

We should be guided in these measures not by the failure or the default of the soldier to take advantage of the technicalities of the law, but we should be guided by our duty and by our moral obligation to the soldier's mother, to the soldier's widow—a soldier who, forsooth, through ignorance or inadvertence, has permitted his policy to lapse.

I have the case of a soldier who was discharged in February of 1919—Harold J. Taylor, of Lakeview, Oreg. He died in December, 1919, of tuberculosis. He was found by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to have been a temporary total disability from the time of his discharge. A month after he was discharged he endeavored to work, but immediately fainted. He was sent to the hospital in San Francisco, and died in December, 1919. Every doctor who considered his case found that the tuberculosis was of service origin; that from the day of his discharge he was unable to work. He did not even put in an application for his compensation. Had he done so, he would have been entitled to $90 a month from the date of his discharge. Yet he defaulted on that and defaulted upon his insurance, allowed it to lapse, either through ignorance or through some inadvertence. And now his wife is denied the insurance that the others receive. It seems to me that the gentleman's amendment is a most meritorious one.

Oh, the bravest battle that ever was fought;
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the map of the world you will find it not;
'Twas fought by the mothers of men.
'Twas not with cannon or battle shot,
With sword or noble pen;
'Twas not with eloquent word or thought,
From lips of wonderful men;
But deep in a welled-up woman's heart;
A woman who would not yield,
But bravely, silently bore her part—
Lo! there is that battle field.

It is for that woman, that mother, that wife, bravely, silently bearing her part, that I am appealing. I hope this amendment will give them some little benefit, the same benefit that the mothers and wives of the other boys are getting. I do not think this boy's mother or his wife should be penalized—a boy who was a total disability—merely because his insurance policy, through his ignorance or inadvertence, had lapsed. I sincerely hope that this House will give to that mother and to that wife an opportunity to reinstate that policy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 52.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. ELLIOTT and Mr. DENISON took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 70.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote the tellers report the ayes are 70 and the noes are 70.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not agree that there were 70 in the negative. I think there were 69. I ask for a recount.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will order the vote to be retaken. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 78.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. A new section is hereby added to Article IV of the war risk insurance act, to be known as section 409 and to read as follows:

"SEC. 409. The Veterans' Bureau is authorized to make provision in accordance with regulations whereby the premiums on yearly renewable term insurance and United States Government life insurance (converted insurance) may be waived and the insurance may be deemed not to lapse in the cases of the following persons, to wit: (a) Those who are confined in a hospital under said bureau for a compensable disability during the period while they are so confined; (b) those who are rated as temporarily totally disabled by reason of an injury or disease entitling them to compensation during the period of such total disability and while they are so rated: Provided, That such relief from payment of premiums on renewable term insurance shall be for full calendar months, beginning with the month in which said confinement to hospital or temporary total disability rating begins and ending with that month during the half or major fraction of which the person is confined in hospital or is rated as temporarily totally disabled."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Page 22, line 12, after the word "disabled," add the following: "This section shall be regarded as in effect as of date April 6, 1917."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered here gives all those for whom the benefits of the war risk insurance act were provided the benefits of this provision. In other words, it is made retroactive instead of operating simply with reference to the cases of those who would be entitled to the benefits of the act from now on. There are cases that certainly are just as deserving, cases of ex-service men, who have not had and can not now secure the benefits of this provision—benefits which will only apply to cases in the future, and it occurs to me that it is highly equitable that the amendment offered by me should be adopted.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. SWEET. The purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to make it retroactive?

Mr. BRIGGS. The purpose is to make it retroactive and give the others the benefit from the period back, just as is done in many other provisions of the war risk insurance act, and as was done in your bill passed in December, 1919.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does this cover all men in the service, regardless of their diligence or lack of diligence in reference to insurance matters?

Mr. BRIGGS. This new section, irrespective of that, says:

The veterans' bureau is authorized to make provision, in accordance with regulations, whereby the premiums on yearly renewable term insurance and United States Government life insurance (converted insurance) may be waived and the insurance may be deemed not to lapse in the cases of the following persons, to wit: (a) Those who are confined in a hospital under said bureau for a compensable disability during the period while they are so confined; (b) those who are rated as temporarily totally disabled by reason of an injury or disease entitling them to compensation during the period of such total disability and while they are so rated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman see no distinction between the cases excepted there and a blanket provision making it all retroactive?

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not see why any distinction between giving those from now on the benefit and those——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Even if they are in good health?

Mr. BRIGGS. This affects only the time from which the new section is to be operative as to ex-service men.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Without any regard to their diligence?

Mr. BRIGGS. This is based on the inability of these parties to pay these premiums.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. A new section is hereby added to Article IV of the war risk insurance act, to be known as section 410, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 410. Under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General may prescribe, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to receive the premiums on yearly renewable term insurance and United States Government life insurance (converted insurance) and to act for and turn over to the Secretary of the Treasury the money so received, and he also is authorized to receive and transmit to the veterans' bureau applications for reinstatement of lapsed insurance and applications for conversion of yearly renewable term insurance."

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: After the word "received," in line 22, page 22, insert "and if the money-order system is used as an agency for the transmission of such money, the Postmaster General may adopt a specially designed money-order form for such purpose."

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I will say that this is an amendment to perfect this section and make it entirely workable, and the suggestion comes from the Postmaster General.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. A new section is hereby added to Article IV of the war risk insurance act to be known as section 411, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 411. Subject to the provisions of section 29 of the war risk insurance act and amendments thereto policies of insurance heretofore or hereafter issued in accordance with Article IV of the war risk insurance act shall be incontestable after six months from date of issuance, or reinstatement, except for fraud or nonpayment of premiums."

Mr. PRINGEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. PRINGEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, just briefly I want to congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], who has had this bill in charge, and also those of the committee who have cooperated with him, and especially I want to congratulate this body, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the favorable consideration that this important measure has had. This bill, when understood, will be the voice of the American people.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to ask that the gentleman confine himself to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. PRINGEY. Just briefly. I shall not hurt you. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINSLOW. I will say that the gentleman is trying the patience of myself and the House.

Mr. PRINGEY. This is the first time I have annoyed the gentleman. We have been elected on a platform of economy, but, thank God, this body of men is not going to economize over the graves of over 70,000 of our boys who sleep on the vine-clad hills of France. They are not going to economize, through the provisions of this bill, over the fevered pillows of over 120,000 mothers of America. I am proud of that. God bless the boys who participated in the World War!

The brotherhood of the American Legion will grow and sink deeper into the affections of the American people as the years go by. The cost of this war, though great it be, is a good investment, not being 2 per cent on the civilization that it saved.

Generations yet unborn as they turn to view the course of the human race, will see the heroes of his war towering above the masses, carrying torchlights of civilization.

As they open the pages of universal history they will see their fair brows shining with splendor, their bright eyes beaming with radiance divine, and their names indelibly enrolled there, written by the hand of ages on pages of silver in letters of gold.

Their conduct on the Rhine when they said: "By the gods, they shall not pass"! stands not alone by the way. From Yorktown, Appomattox, and Manila Bay came the same clarion cry. Do not talk to me! When Germany sank our merchant vessels, if we had said, "In six months we will put 2,000,000 men on the Rhine, 2,000,000 men more ready to send"; there would not have been any war.

Amid all the shadows, gloom, and sadness caused in the hearts of 120,000 American mothers, there never has been a time when we had a greater right to be proud of our Government than to-day. A Government that is able to loan $10,000,000,000 to the Allies, put 4,000,000 men in arms, as noble specimens of manhood as the world ever beheld, contracted a debt upon her own shoulders of $30,000,000,000—this in the eyes of the world is not only the greatest guaranty of our ability, but the greatest guaranty of world peace, so far as America is concerned. [Applause.]

The nations of the earth, as never before, understand the language of that old flag. Let us teach every bolshevik within our borders that he must take the oath of allegiance, and when he violates that obligation, let us make him kiss the old flag, and toss him into the sea a cable length from shore where the tide ebbs and flows twice in 24 hours. [Applause.]

Let us teach our children's children the language of that old flag. It is no mere piece of silk or bunting; it is no mere fine cloth woven by human hands. It is a living thing, throbbing the pulsing ardor of humanity. [Applause.] It is a song of upward-looking men; it is a garden where grew the greatest Nation under the sun, watered by the dews of heaven and the tears of our forefathers; it is an altar made fragrant by sacrifices. [Applause.]

In that flag we see the heroism of Lexington; we see the farmers at Concord bridge; we see John Paul Jones riding the crest of the waves; we hear the clarion death call above the ruined Alamo; we can hear the prayers of Washington at Valley Forge; we can hear the sobbings of Lincoln as he walked the floor those midnight hours; over and above all, my friends, we can see the wind-swept faces of 70,000 of our boys who died on the thunder-smitten hills of France for that flag. [Applause.]

True men will always gladly die and the living will always proudly live, and it will wave so long as loving hope shall swell within the breast of man. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PRINGEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. HERRICK. I object. The gentleman has been making that speech ever since the Civil War. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 23, at the end of line 9, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 30. That a new section is hereby added to Article II of the war risk insurance act as amended, to be known as section 212, and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 212. The family allowance shall be awarded and paid to any person or persons within class A for the full period defined in section 204 hereof, or for such part of said period as it shall be shown that the necessary relationship existed between such person and an enlisted man in the active military or naval service, in cases where deductions from the pay of the enlisted man for compulsory allotment have not been made but the family allowance was applied for during the service of the enlisted man, notwithstanding the fact that such enlisted man has died in or been discharged from the service: Provided, That compulsory allotment has not been waived or that exemption therefrom has not been heretofore or shall not be hereafter granted.'"

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment, that this is not the proper place for it. It purports to amend Article II of the war risk insurance act, a title that was dealt with in this bill several pages back. We are now on Article IV of the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, Article II of the war risk insurance act is not specifically mentioned in the bill. It is true that section 210 of Article II is amended and reenacted in the bill, but the section which I have offered is offered as a new section, and in the exact language in which it was contained in the Wason bill which passed during the last session. It is true that the amendment I have offered covers very much the same subject matter as the one I offered this morning, but there is this difference: The amendment that I offered this morning was taken from what is known as the Sweet bill which passed in 1919, and that amendment provided that these allowances should be paid in all cases where an application had been made or should hereafter be made. The amendment which I am now offering, which is taken from the Wason bill, provides that such allowance shall only be paid in cases where application was made during the term of the service of the soldier, which I think is a very different proposition, and one that would be in order as a separate section of the bill. It certainly is germane to the general scope and purpose of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has often held that the rule which requires that an amendment shall not only be germane to the bill but germane to the section, requires that an amendment, to be in order, shall be offered at the place in the bill where it normally would come in the regular sequence of the legislation. The Chair thinks it would not be in order to offer an amendment to the pending section of the bill which in effect and in reality is an amendment to a section that properly belongs in Article II of the bill. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Page 23, after line 9, add a new section, as follows:

"The provisions of this act, as well as those of the war risk act as amended, shall be liberally construed in favor of claimants within the class of beneficiaries entitled to relief under the provisions of this act."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to put in the word "insurance" after the words "war risk."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks to modify his amendment in the manner specified. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 9, add a new section, as follows:

"The provisions of this act, as well as those of the war risk insurance act as amended, shall be liberally construed in favor of the claimant within the class of beneficiaries entitled to relief under the provisions of this act."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. Certainly the rule that I have made applicable is the rule of law that obtains in the construction of insurance policies in the courts and has obtained for many years. It pertains to the provisions of this act and interprets every provision of the act, and certainly can not be held to be out of order. We all know that it is getting to be more and more difficult now for the men to prove up, particularly in cases of disease with which they are afflicted, such as tuberculosis, and it is getting more difficult as time goes on to make rigid proof, and the provisions are being more rigidly construed by the bureau. This amendment does nothing more than to make applicable to the interpretation and construction of the act by the director of the principle which the courts recognize that the act shall be liberally construed in favor of the ex-service men and shall not be construed strictly against them.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard against the point of order. I think the amendment is clearly in order. It is a specific direction to the officer of the Government who is to execute this law that Congress is to pass to construe same liberally in behalf of our disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines. Without this instruction to the director he would continue to construe the law strictly against the ex-service men. Clearly it is germane to the intent and purposes of the bill. The whole purpose of the measure is to confer additional benefits upon disabled ex-service men. It is to enlarge their opportunities to obtain these benefits. It is to make the present laws more elastic. By this amendment we would say to the director, "Mr. Officer, when you go to execute this law you must construe all of its provisions liberally in favor of the beneficiaries, whom it is designed to benefit. The Government is their friend and not their enemy, and you must not look upon them with suspicion as soon as they file an application for relief. But your inspection of their claims must be a friendly inspection and not an antagonistic one."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas provides that the provisions of this act, as well as the war risk insurance act as amended, shall be liberally construed in favor of the claimant, and so forth. The provision offered by the gentleman from Texas undertakes to interpret not only the sections of the war risk insurance act as amended but many sections of the war risk insurance act which are not before the House now for amendment. The Chair thinks it is not in order on this bill to amend sections or interpret sections of the war risk act which are not before the House for amendment or interpretation. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to reoffer the amendment with the portion relating to the war risk insurance act stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, after line 9, add a new section, as follows:

"The provisions of this act shall be liberally construed in favor of claimants within the class of beneficiaries entitled to relief under the provisions of this act."

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that it is becoming increasingly apparent that men who are entitled to the benefits of the act are having the utmost difficulty in establishing that fact. The evidence is becoming increasingly difficult to obtain because of the lapse of time and scattering of the witnesses all over the country. The bureau also is becoming more rigid in the interpretation of the law. It is not doing it as liberally as it used to do. It is, for instance, saying to ex-service men that the evidence is not sufficient to connect up the disability with service origin. They suggest that the men get affidavits from their comrades in order to prove that they were so disabled. The great difficulty is their comrades are extremely difficult to locate. They do not know where to turn to get them. They do get affidavits of physicians and those who knew them at home. Naturally, many of these men can not say specifically that the man had that injury or was disabled in the service, although they can state that when he went into the service he was apparently a healthy man, and that he came out of it with a complaint or disease of some kind.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. SWEET. Did the gentleman ever know of a provision of this kind being placed in a law? In other words, this is an instruction to those administering the law and indirectly to the court that may be required to pass upon it, and the instruction is to the effect that the law must be construed and administered liberally.

Mr. BRIGGS. No; we are delegating a trustee to act for the Government in this case. It is not intended to make the soldier go into court in order to sustain his claim.

Mr. SWEET. I am not disagreeing with the gentleman as to the construction of the law, but you want to put it into the law that it shall be construed liberally. Who is to determine the liberality?

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's question I want to say this, that the director of the veterans' bureau is the one who is the trustee to execute this law for the people of the United States. He is the one to know and conclude whether the people of the United States want him to construe the act liberally for the benefit of the ex-service man or strictly against him.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRIGGS) there were—ayes 29, noes 114.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall not take up the time of the committee any more than to ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a statement of the work on rehabilitation of Great Britain. They were in the war much longer than we, had many more soldiers wounded. Their service of rehabilitation is very much longer in time than ours and yet our work compares most favorably with the work of Great Britain. I have looked into the work that is done in Canada. Canada had about the same number of soldiers wounded as we had, and they have a few more trained, but not as many in training as we have. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a tabulated statement of this work by Great Britain.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the statement to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, who makes the statement? What is the authority?

Mr. FESS. The statement comes from the authorities of Great Britain. I think through the State Department. It is official.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

UNITED KINGDOM (GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND) SOLDIER AND SAILOR REHABILITATION.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will now return to page 12, section 15, for the consideration of an amendment which was passed over by unanimous consent. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, there were certain objections urged to the amendment that was offered yesterday, and since that time the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] and myself, he being a member of the committee, have gone over the matter quite carefully, and I have a substitute which I desire to offer instead of the one now pending. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment now pending and to offer in its place a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to withdraw the pending amendment and to offer instead a substitute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HICKEY: Page 12, line 25, after the word "beneficiary," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add: "Provided further, That an enemy alien who volunteered or who was drafted into the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the World War, and who was not discharged from the service on his own application or solicitation by reason of his being an enemy alien, and whose service was honest and faithful, shall be entitled to the benefits of the war risk insurance act and all amendments thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, a number of Members of the House, who represent interests not to be regarded lightly, have asked the committee having charge of this bill if, out of order, it would be willing to permit a representative of themselves an opportunity to say something with reference to one phase of this bill. The committee is not disposed, on its own motion, to object. The subject matter is of importance. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] may be allowed to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] be allowed to speak for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. About what?

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman desires, as I understand it, to speak to a portion of section 6 of this bill, respecting the suboffices.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FISH. I have refrained from trying to get an opportunity to speak on the number of suboffices because I understood the committee would get me this opportunity. I think it is too important a question——

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I did not speak on that matter either. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. STAFFORD having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau, and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. At what time would a motion to recommit be proper?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Immediately after the third reading of the bill. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

Mr. RAYBURN. If nobody else demands a separate vote on the Elliott amendment, I demand one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the other amendments reported by the Chairman.

The question was taken, and the other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the Elliott amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELLIOTT: Page 21, line 16, after the word "policy," strike out the period, insert a semicolon and the following: "Provided further, That where any soldier has heretofore allowed his insurance to lapse while suffering from wounds or disease suffered or contracted in line of service, and was at the time he allowed his said policy to lapse entitled to compensation on account thereof in a sum equal to or in excess of the amount due from him in premiums on his said insurance, and has since died from said wounds or disease without collecting or making claim for said compensation or being allowed to reinstate his said policy on account of his physical condition, then and in that event said policy shall not be considered as lapsed; and the veterans' bureau is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the beneficiaries of said soldier under said policy the amount of said insurance in installments as provided by law."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be modified to conform to a suggestion of the enrolling clerk to have a colon inserted in place of a semicolon as suggested in the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the Elliott amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RAYBURN) there were—ayes 108, noes 60.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana and Mr. DENISON rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. DENISON. To move to recommit.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I also desire to move to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Illinois opposed to the bill?

Mr. DENISON. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Indiana opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will not support the bill in its present form; I am opposed to the bill in its present form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana to make a motion to recommit. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLAND of Indiana moves to recommit the bill (H. R. 6611) to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment as follows: "Strike out the word 'fifty' in line 10 on page 5 and insert in lieu thereof the words 'one hundred and forty.'"

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SWING. If this motion to recommit carries, I want to know if it will operate as an automatic amendment. I want to know whether there will be a long delay or any delay in the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the practice of the House when a motion to recommit is carried it is automatically reported back with the amendment incorporated for vote on the final passage of the bill. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Forty-four Members have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the other side. I submit that that is more than one-fifth of the Members present, and I ask that the Chair count the other side.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. There is no other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count the Members present to determine whether the number demanding the yeas and nays are a sufficient number as prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. RAYBURN. I suggest that the Chair notice the Members going out of the door over there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (after counting). Two hundred and four Members are present, a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. RAYBURN. Did the Chair note the gentlemen standing in the doors?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the precedents the House is not considered as limited merely to the Hall of the House, but also includes the cloak rooms and the lobby adjacent to the Chamber. The Chair included in his count 193 Members on the floor of the Chamber, 11 who had left the Chamber after the demand for the other side had been made. [Laughter and applause.] A sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 224, nays 113, not voting 94, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 1811. An act to amend the Federal farm loan act as amended; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 86. An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns this evening it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

I do this because of the fact that the peace resolution will be presented to the House, but prior to the presentation of the rule on the peace resolution the conference report on the deficiency bill will be called up. It may take an hour to dispose of that conference report and other matters that may come before the House before we can take up the rule on the peace resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would venture to suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that he indicate to the House that it would be highly desirable to have a quorum present at 11 o'clock when the House convenes. Otherwise, from my knowledge of the conduct of business, I should think a roll would be called for, probably, which will consume some time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we shall have before the House important and interesting questions and matters for discussion on the convening of the House at 11 o'clock, and I hope all the Members will be here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the majority leader to indicate the time that will probably be given to the consideration of the peace resolution in general debate.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Rules proposes to offer an amendment to the rule that has been voted, fixing an hour on Monday when the final vote shall come on the peace resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, acting under the instructions of the House and in behalf of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I report back to the House the bill H. R. 6611 with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. According to the instructions of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts reports the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINSLOW, on behalf of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reports the following amendment: Strike out the word "fifty," in line 10, page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and forty."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I understand it is put back as amended.

The SPEAKER. This is on the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The bill has been recommitted and must be reported again.

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill must be reported back to the House by the committee with that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is necessary to report the entire bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that; but the gentleman from Massachusetts can report the bill, with the amendment agreed on, without reading the entire bill. The bill having been recommitted to the committee, it must be reported back to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

Mr. WALSH. That has not been done. The bill has not been reported with the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINSLOW, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reports back to the House the bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act, with the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment has already been agreed to, and that the bill is now on passage with the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand it. The bill has been reported back. The House has now again to adopt the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. Those in favor of the passage of the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 335, nays 0, not voting 96, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. TAYLOR of New Jersey with Mr. FIELDS.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. VAILE with Mr. RUCKER.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. WINSLOW, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. PETERS, is unavoidably absent. If he were here, he would support this legislation.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same announcement with reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BUTLER, who is unavoidably absent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the same announcement with reference to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same announcement with reference to the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. SISSON.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the late Col. Galbraith.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit the following tribute to Col. Frederick W. Galbraith, jr.:

When we began the consideration of this legislation on the 2d day of June there was a man in the full bloom of life, in the prime of his manhood, at the head of the American Legion. Today he sleeps in the cold embrace of death. The flag that he defended upon the fields of France is flying at half-mast from every Legion post in America in memory of their comrade and friend.

This is a splendid manifestation of their respect and confidence.

Col. Frederick W. Galbraith, jr., was killed in an automobile accident on the 8th day of June. His death, I am told, was instantaneous.

He was well and favorably known by a large number of the Members of the House and Senate. He had taken an active and enthusiastic part in the framing of this legislation.

He was a man of deeds and few words. He had the interests of the disabled ex-service men at heart. He devoted his whole time in the performance of the duties of his great office. He traveled from one end of the country to the other, addressing audiences almost daily, discussing and setting forth the needs of his comrades.

Is it any wonder that they are grateful to him and that the mourners are many and sincere? Some one has said that "gratitude is the fairest flower that sheds its perfume in the heart."

He was a commanding figure in American life. He was at the head of a mighty organization of over 2,000,000 men scattered all over this great land of ours.

Col. Galbraith took an active part in the World War on the field of battle. He was one of the few officers of his rank to win the distinguished service cross for heroism in action.

He was a man of courage, ability, and integrity. He was a natural leader of men. He stood for that which is best and noblest in our national life. Intellectually he was keen and alert. He possessed a wonderful personality.

He was honest, sincere, and kind. He was a faithful friend. He was a genuine American.

These words alone build a monument of glory above the grave of any man who is worthy of them. In the prime of his manhood he reached his journey's end. "Night has fallen upon noon."

He was a friend of man. He was my friend.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5010, the Army appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Army appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Reserving the right to object, I understand it is agreed on the part of the chairman of the committee that the Senate amendment raising the appropriation for enlisted men will be brought back to the House for a separate vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no formal understanding, although I think I did express myself by saying that, as far as I knew, neither myself nor any other member of the conferees would be disposed to make any radical concession in regard to the matter without consulting the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman has conferred with Mr. SISSON, who will probably be one of the conferees on the matter. Mr. SISSON indicated to me in a conversation that there were some matters that he would want a separate vote upon before yielding.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should be disposed if my colleagues insist on a separate vote to yield to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. SLEMP, Mr. SISSON, and Mr. HARRISON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, was given indefinite leave of absence on account of the serious illness of his wife.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 11, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

159. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination and survey of Buffalo Bayou, Tex. (H. Doc. No. 93); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

160. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Bayou Lacassine, La.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 11, 1921.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., Chaplain Emeritus, offered the following prayer:

Help us, O Lord God, our heavenly Father, to eliminate all of the evils that we have allowed to creep into our being, that we may present ourselves to Thee pure, noble, true men. We realize that this is the day of salvation, and that if we live right to-day we shall be in a better condition to get closer to Thee on the morrow. So, if we conduct our lives now in accordance with the great principles which Thy Son didst reveal to us, we shall have no fear for the future. It is now that we are concerned; then we shall be in Thy holy presence, guided ever more unto the right. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill H. R. 6300, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa presents a conference report upon the bill H. R. 6300, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on a certain amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 insert the following:

"Provided, That no person shall be employed from the appropriation for the Bureau of Efficiency for the fiscal year 1922 at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except the following: One at $7,500, one at $6,000, one at $4,250, six at $4,000 each, three at $3,600 each, one at $3,500, two at $3,250 each, five at $3,000 each, two at $2,750 each, three at $2,400 each, and five at $2,000 each.

And the House agree to the same.

JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment No. 1 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate amendment proposed an appropriation of $10,000 additional for the remainder of the current fiscal year for the Bureau of Efficiency. The House concurred in the Senate amendment with an amendment agreeing to the appropriation and placing a salary limitation of $7,500 on the chief of the bureau and a limitation on other salaries of the rates in effect on July 1, 1920. The amendment agreed upon in the accompanying report carries the same salary limitation upon the chief of the bureau and specifically enumerates the number of persons who may be employed and the rates of compensation which may be paid during the fiscal year 1922 in excess of the rate of $1,800 per annum.

JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, the provision contained in the House amendment was general, and the only increase granted by the conference report which was not recognized in the amendment of the House is one position, that of the assistant in the office who would receive $6,500. Under this provision he would receive $6,000 in lieu of $6,500, which he now receives. It reduces his salary by $500.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to have the opinion of the gentleman from Iowa, before he leaves Congress, as to the wisdom of the expenditure of this money through the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. GOOD. As I view it, there is no place now for the Bureau of Efficiency. The Bureau of Efficiency ought to be taken over by the President and turned over to his budget staff, and whatever force he has there that he feels it is desirable to retain ought to be turned over to the Bureau of the Budget and the money spent there.

Mr. GARNER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that I hope the Committee on Appropriations, or some committee of the House, when they are considering the question of the President's budget and it gets into working order next winter, will remember the gentleman's remarks and undertake to save to the Treasury the balance that may be there at that time.

Mr. GOOD. I think there will be a duplication for next year unless the President by some order in creating his budget bureau takes this office into consideration, which for the next year will have $125,000.

Mr. GARNER. Has the President under the present law power to save the Government this duplication?

Mr. GOOD. I think so, because he creates the entire bureau of the budget, and in creating that can ask that these duties be transferred, and this Bureau of Efficiency will transact only such duties as the President may direct. The trouble with the Bureau of Efficiency has been that it has been doing work at the request of certain Members of Congress, when it is in fact a bureau of efficiency and an organ of the President and not of Congress at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think that the personnel of this bureau, with the experience they have had along the line of their work, could be very well assigned to the duties involved under the new budget system.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, I think so. I think they have had a very great experience, and I know they have some very good men connected with the Bureau of Efficiency. That bureau ought to be taken over by the President unquestionably.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Can the gentleman tell us whether or not Congress has ever followed the recommendation of this Bureau of Efficiency in cutting down the needless and useless employees in the Government service?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; the Bureau of Efficiency has on a great many occasions stepped into the departments of the Government and brought about a very great reduction in the number of offices. They did that in the Treasury Department, in the Post Office Department, in The Adjutant General's office, and also did some work, as I recall, in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. They have done some very good work, but what I have said with regard to increasing their salaries I would not wish to be taken as a reflection upon the character of the service which many of the men have performed.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have no intention of reflecting on this bureau. I think the bureau has done good work. The trouble has been that Congress has not followed its recommendations in respect to these needless employees. Some of us would follow the recommendations of the bureau when the bill was originally before the House, but after it had gone to the Senate and come back and then gone into conference, and was finally adopted, we would find that the recommendations of the Bureau of Efficiency had been practically ignored.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Did I understand that when they make up this new budget organization they will do it largely from the present employees of the Treasury Department, the expert men along this line?

Mr. GOOD. This bureau is not a bureau in the Treasury Department. It is the President's bureau.

Mr. SNELL. I know that.

Mr. GOOD. The President is left free to select his budget staff.

Mr. SNELL. It is not intended necessarily to take them from the present employees.

Mr. GOOD. Not at all; but if there is no need for this organization in the future, as there will be no need for it now that the President has approved of the budget bill, the Bureau of Efficiency, so far as it will fit in with the work of the bureau of the budget, and it is all of the same class of work, could be taken over and ought to be taken over.

Mr. SNELL. That is the point that I am getting at. It ought to be taken over.

Mr. GOOD. I think there is no question about that.

Mr. SNELL. They will practically make up the entire budget organization?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not the trouble in the past been that every time Mr. Herbert D. Brown, who is at the head of this Efficiency Bureau, has made recommendations to bring about more efficiency those recommendations have been turned down by bureau chiefs, and that immediately a fight is made on him with respect to his recommendations? Has not that been the trouble in the past?

Mr. GOOD. Well, I do not believe there has been very much difficulty along that line.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me be specific. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa will remember, because he keeps up with these things, the specific recommendation made by Mr. Herbert D. Brown, a copy of which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that the Members would be acquainted with it, to the effect that we would never get efficiency in any department from any of the Government employees until Congress did that same thing for all employees that we did to the firemen and policemen of the District—separate them from their affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. The gentleman will remember that specific recommendation, and immediately a fight was made upon Mr. Herbert D. Brown, trying to put him out of office, and the fight has been on him ever since.

Mr. GOOD. Well, Mr. Speaker, with these amendments, the situation, as compared with the present force will be as follows: At present the director receives $10,000. Under the conference report he will receive $7,500. The assistant receives $6,500, and for next year he will receive but $6,000. There is one now at $4,500. There will be none at $4,500 next year. There are three at $4,250; there will be one next year at $4,250. There are six at $4,000 now. There will be six at $4,000 next year. There is one at $3,750, and for next year there will be three at $3,600. There is one at $3,500, and next year there will be one at $3,500. There is one at $3,250 for this year, and next year there will be two at $3,250. Now there are seven at $3,000, and next year there will be five at $3,000. There are none at $2,750 now, and next year there will be two at $2,750. This reduces two employees' salaries from $3,000 to $2,750. There are three at $2,500, and next year there will be none. There is one at $2,400 now, and next year there will be three at $2,400. There are two at $2,250 now, and there will be none at that figure next year. There are two at $2,000 now, and next year there will be five at $2,000.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. SMITH. Are the employees of the Efficiency Bureau in the classified service?

Mr. GOOD. That is my recollection.

Mr. SMITH. Were they appointed through competitive examination or detailed from other departments?

Mr. GOOD. Some of these chief investigators may not be under the classified service, but I will have to look that up.

Mr. SMITH. I understand the amendment suggested by the gentleman is to limit the salaries of these employees to prevent them increasing their own salaries at their own pleasure.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; absolutely. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman state the total?

Mr. GOOD. The total amount is not changed for next year. This amendment just deals with next year as a limitation upon the amount and comes within the limitation carried in the act. The act simply carries a provision that not more than 15 persons shall be employed at rates of pay in excess of $3,000, and it allows the director the right to fix the rates of pay of those 15 persons. The total is $125,000 for next year.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communications.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1921.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Appropriations and as chairman of that committee.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES W. GOOD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1921.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as chairman of the Select Committee on the Budget.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES W. GOOD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the resignations are accepted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there is not a Member of this House who has not heard with very great regret the resignation of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] just presented.

We have known for some time that the gentleman from Iowa contemplated retiring to private life. While we have known this perhaps we have none of us realized up to this time just how much his separation from the public service means to the House. It is impossible to measure in money the value of the public service that a man with the courage, the capacity, and the good judgment possessed by the gentleman from Iowa renders when these splendid qualities are exercised at the head of a great committee of the House. [Applause]. To say that the value of those services run into the millions is not to use the language of exaggeration, and yet great as the loss is to the public service we can not chide our friend for his decision, for after all a man's first duty is to his family. We know that the service here to a man who has not accumulated a fortune is a continuous sacrifice. We know that there are many Members of the House who are constantly reminded that every day of service here on the salary they receive and with the obligations they have upon them render their financial situation more and more trying. Realizing this, much as we regret the going of our friend, we can not and we would not criticise him for his decision. While the service he could perform, the service he has performed, here can not be measured in dollars, there are opportunities for splendid service in private life, and knowing the gentleman from Iowa as we do we know that wherever he may be, whatever his occupation may be, whatever activity may engage his attention, he will always be working in the public interest. [Applause.] The resignation of the gentleman from Iowa adds one more to the line of distinguished ex-chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The House has been most fortunate in the men who have been selected for that important position. It is not essential to the fame of the gentleman from Iowa to say that he has been the greatest chairman that committee has ever had; it is sufficient for any man's fame or standing in this House, or wherever the work of the Congress is known and appreciated, to say that no man ever presided over this committee or presented its bills to the House with better manners, with sounder judgment, with finer courage, with greater success than the gentleman from Iowa. [Applause.] He will be remembered as an earnest, faithful chairman of the committee, always anxious to keep the appropriations within the proper limits, and successful in a large measure in doing so at a time most trying and difficult. But he will also be remembered, and perhaps longer than, as chairman of the committee, for the work he has performed in connection with the establishment of a budget system. This great measure of reform, from which we expect so much, will always be linked and associated with his name.

And so he goes from us to private life leaving behind him a splendid example of devotion to the public service. He will be remembered as a man possessing abundantly the highest and best qualities, as one who devoted these qualities unselfishly and faithfully to his country. In the history of public affairs he will be especially remembered as the man who had much to do with bringing about the great and much-needed reform of the budget.

Our good will goes with him. We extend to him our thanks and appreciation for his good service and kindly companionship here. We wish him Godspeed and success, health, and happiness, not only for himself but for all his family, wherever their lot may be cast in the future. [Loud applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. MADDEN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, to be fortified with the consciousness of one's own rectitude should be the highest aim of men in public office. That is the compensation to which we should aspire for the work we do. If fidelity to duty is the measure by which men are to be gauged, JAMES W. GOOD should receive the plaudits of the American people. [Applause.] He is a great lawyer, but he has had no client except the Nation during his membership in the House. [Applause.] He has had no interest except the people's interest. He has been devoted unselfishly to the public service. He has been patriotic during a period in which men's courage was sorely tried. There has been no work too hard, no day too long, for him. He has possessed system, industry, devotion, patriotism, fidelity as great as that of any other man I have ever known. He leaves us with the affectionate regard of every Member of the House. He goes back into the ranks of the masters of the membership of the House, and henceforth we will look to him for advice and guidance in the duties we may have to perform here as servants of the American people.

JAMES W. GOOD has been in every sense a true public servant. [Applause.] No higher commendation could be given to any man than to say that he has had no personal interest in the work he has been called upon to do in his public office—truthful, with a patriotism as great as that of any man I have ever known, with a courage that no man could put down, he has been devoted to economy in the Government service, to integrity in the administration of national affairs, to the accomplishment of everything which had for its purpose the amelioration of conditions among the people.

I regret to see him go. I have had great pleasure in associating with him as a member of the Budget and Appropriation Committees. I have marveled at his industry, at his vision, at his courage, at his success. He more than any other man that I ever knew was able to harmonize all the elements among the men who associated with him and have them work as a single man. The accomplishments which he as a Member of Congress has achieved will be with him as a heritage for the future. I predict for him the greatest success in his new field of endeavor. He goes to the second city on the American continent, there to compete with men who do things. And he starts with an assurance of a hearty reception by every citizen of Chicago and every other citizen of the State of Illinois. And he has the confidence of the entire American public. I bid him Godspeed and success, good health and prosperity. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am sure there is universal regret that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has felt it to be his duty to resign from Congress and to retire to private life. His retirement will be a distinct loss to the country and to the Congress.

Personal popularity may be acquired in many ways, but I think it is safe to say that one can only permanently retain the regard and the esteem of the entire membership of the House by hard and earnest work and a faithful devotion to public duty. The gentleman from Iowa as he retires to-day from public life will carry with him into private life the genuine regard and esteem of the entire membership of the Congress. [Applause.]

I may be pardoned for saying that his retirement, to me, is in the deepest sense a personal loss, for I have been closely associated with him personally and officially throughout practically all of my service in Congress. JIM GOOD is my warm personal friend. We entered Congress together, he a strong and partisan Republican from the State of Iowa and I a partisan Democrat from the State of Tennessee. He served during his first term, as I recall, on the Committee on Territories and possibly on other committees. I served on the Committee on Indian Affairs. But at the end of two years we were placed on the Committee on Appropriations, and by a peculiar coincidence, possibly, we have served together during that time upon the same subcommittees. When the Democratic Party was in control he served as a member of subcommittees of which I was chairman, and since the Republican Party came into control I have had the privilege of serving as a member of subcommittees of which he has been the chairman. As a result I have come into the closest contact with him personally and officially.

We have had our differences, many of them, and some of them very sharp differences, but I can truly say that in all of these differences I have never had the least reason to suspect that he was actuated by any other motive save that of the highest sense of public duty. [Applause.]

I have served under three chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations—Mr. Fitzgerald, of the State of New York; Mr. Sherley, of Kentucky; and our friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who is now about to retire. It has always been a very proud tradition of the Committee on Appropriations that all of its chairmen throughout its entire history have been men of great ability and energy—zealous and faithful in the discharge of their duty, and fearless and untiring in their efforts to bring about economy in public expenditures. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has made passing reference to this fact. Among them was the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], whom everyone on both sides of the House, without regard to party, dearly loves. [Applause.] Mr. Randall, of Pennsylvania, and many others, all of whom measured up to this splendid standard.

The gentleman from Iowa during his service as chairman of that committee has fully measured up to the standard set by his able predecessors, and will be known in the future on account of his service as one of the great chairmen of that great committee. Valuable, Mr. Speaker, as his service has been as a Member of the House, and as a member and chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I believe that one of the greatest services he has rendered to his country has been the work he has done toward bringing about the enactment and establishment of a budget system, which became a law on the day before yesterday. Many distinguished statesmen, including Presidents and ex-Presidents, both in Congress and in the press of the country, have advocated the establishment of the budget system for many years in the past. Writers on economic subjects have impressed upon the country the importance of a better and more efficient method of handling our appropriations and making public expenditures. But it remained for the gentleman from Iowa, by his leadership, to put the machinery into operation and to bring about the actual enactment and establishment of a budget system. [Applause.] No law, however wisely conceived, will prove a success unless it is faithfully and honestly administered. If the right sort of officials are appointed to administer this law, and if the President and those who shall come after him in that high office avail themselves of the opportunity to acquire the most complete and accurate knowledge of the financial needs of the Government, and to compel economy in expenditures, it will prove to be one of the greatest constructive measures passed in many years, promoting not only economy but also bringing about coordination and a higher state of efficiency in all the departments of the Government.

And let me say that in the years to come this great service that JAMES W. GOOD has rendered will prove one of the crowning achievements of his otherwise highly useful and splendid legislative career. [Applause.]

Let me say again that we all, without regard to party, regret that he has felt it to be his duty to his family to retire from the public service. We wish for him the greatest success possible in the practice of his profession in the city of Chicago, the great metropolis of the West, where he will make his home in the future, and the greatest abundance of happiness and pleasure for him and his during many, many years to come. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I can not let this opportunity pass without embracing it by expressing my appreciation of Mr. GOOD as a man and as a public servant.

His going from us will result in his distinctive gain; it will result in a corresponding loss to the United States. In these days, when the whole world is in turmoil, when our own beloved country is in distress, it takes men of character and courage to help to bring back that normalcy which we all so much desire. Mr. GOOD has demonstrated not only by word, but also by act, where it took courage to act, that he has been giving the best that he possessed to bring about that happy purpose.

I happened to be fortunate in having gone West during last summer with some members of the Committee on Appropriations to inspect the great irrigation reclamation projects in the western part of this country. We were received everywhere by those who were interested with every courtesy that they could extend to us. It was natural for those in our party to extend to them every possible encouragement. We found that they were doing a wonderful work and reclaiming what has ever been looked upon as a purely arid region. It was demonstrated that it would take millions, untold millions, of dollars to make that section of the country the garden spot that some time or other it is destined to be. Those immediately in charge, of course, were desirous of having immediate appropriations to bring about that happy result. While we gave them every word of encouragement possible, yet through our chairman, Mr. GOOD, no false hope was held out to them. In each individual instance he tried to minimize the possibilities of Government participation in order that they might not be led to believe that the Government would be able to do for them something that it could not do.

It requires courage and character to do that. And so through all Mr. GOOD's career he has occupied that frank position, and we have heard him speak here upon this floor when it took courage to speak against the popular clamor with reference to appropriations that were being demanded, and we have all honored him and respected him for his unswerving stand.

Now that he is going from us we know that it is pleasant for him to hear these words of commendation, gratifying indeed to know that he is leaving behind a favorable memory that will last with all those who are here, and which will be handed down by those who are to come. But I think the greatest satisfaction that the future can afford for Mr. GOOD will be to see that policies which he has striven so well to carry out will be carried out by those of us who are left behind. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I will append to my remarks a timely editorial from the New York Tribune of this morning, expressing a very accurate appreciation of Mr. GOOD's service in this House, which reads as follows:

[Editorial from New York Tribune of June 11, 1921.]

A WORTHY PUBLIC SERVANT.

JAMES W. GOOD, of Iowa, who resigned yesterday from the House of Representatives, will be counted among the notable Members of that body. He had served for a little more than 12 years and been for a little more than 2 years the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. But he was the first chairman of the committee after its enlargement to conform with the requirements of a genuine budget régime and its recovery of the powers of which it had been stripped in the revolt against Samuel J. Randall's centralized powers.

In his brief term he accomplished prodigies in the way of reducing inflated department estimates of which Randall, CANNON, Holman, and other earlier "watchdogs of the Treasury" never dreamed. They snipped off tens of thousands here and hundreds of thousands there. Sometimes they slashed in millions. But, as Mr. GOOD said in a speech he made in the House on March 4 last, reviewing the appropriations: "In the three sessions of this Republican Congress we have reduced the estimates of President Wilson and his Cabinet by more than $4,163,000,000. Certainly a wonderful record."

Up to 1919 the Appropriations Committee had been relaxing more and more its grasp on expenditures. Randall dominated the House when he was chairman. Because he remained a protectionist rather than because he counted the pennies, the southern free trade element decided to discipline him. They took control of appropriations for the Army, the Navy, post offices and post roads, and other services out of his hands and vested it in rival committees. Multiple responsibility led to laxity and extravagance. The outside committees formed alliances with the departments and abandoned the critical attitude which the old Appropriations Committee had always shown. The House ceased to exercise its true function as an accountant and auditor. Only the vast expansion of Government outlay in war time made it realize the necessity of going back to unified control.

Mr. GOOD believed that the House should be an agent to restrain expenditure, not to stimulate it. He practiced what he preached. He contributed largely to persuading his associates to return to budgetary first principles. He made the enlarged Appropriations Committee a true budget agency, although a budget act was kept off the statute book by President Wilson's veto. He was a reforming chairman, vigilant, conscientious, and courageous. He cut the estimates much deeper in 2 years than they had been cut in all the 20 or 30 years preceding. He retires with a record of brilliant achievement and the gratitude of the public which he so faithfully served.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in every community of any size or importance in this country there is a chamber of commerce, and in that chamber of commerce is a secretary. The success of that secretary is dependent upon his increasing the amount of money expended in that community. If there is a Government activity there, he must endeavor to have it enlarged. If there is no Government activity, he must endeavor to have one located there. He is not specially charged with the duty of defending the Treasury of the United States. When he endeavors to have the department in charge of a particular activity recommend the creation or the enlargement of an activity, it is not difficult for him to succeed, because that official is anxious to have the particular department over which he presides enlarged. When the estimate for funds is once presented to Congress, it is not difficult for the chamber of commerce secretary, appealing through the friends of the Congressman, to convince the Congressman that the activity is meritorious, and that he should appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for the appropriations desired. If 50 per cent of the proposals thus presented to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations were approved of by him and his committee, Government bankruptcy would result. If the appeals of Members are denied by him, he is certainly in danger of antagonizing most of the membership of the House.

That JIM GOOD, under such circumstances, could serve for two years as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and defend the Public Treasury, as he has done, and at the expiration of that time retain even a measure of popularity, is a tribute to the genius of the man and a tribute to the fair-mindedness of the House. [Applause.]

When opportunity came to him he brought to the discharge of the duties of chairman of this great committee not only wonderful energy and great intelligence, but, gentlemen of the House, he brought to it that which the gentleman who preceded me [Mr. WOOD of Indiana] referred to, an unexampled courage. Having served with him for two years, and serving on the same subcommittee with him for a great part of that time, I had opportunity to watch him under the most trying circumstances. Immediately after the war there was a natural desire on the part of those gentlemen who were engaged in purely war activities to have those war activities continued, so that they might continue in the service of the Government. Every effort that was made to discontinue those activities met with opposition on the floor of this House, as well as in the executive departments.

I have watched the chairman of the committee [Mr. GOOD] when I knew that organized efforts were being made to start back-fires upon him from his own district to appeal to him to change his position in order to save his party and to save himself, and never has it been my pleasure to serve with a man who has displayed greater courage than has Mr. GOOD. [Applause.] Time after time have I seen him take positions, conscious as he was of the unpopularity of his attitude, solely because he was convinced that the position he took was for the best interest of his country.

While listening to the pleas of those who have appealed for appropriations it has always impressed me that he sincerely had in mind the millions and millions who never appear before Congress, who never will appear before Congress, and whose only salvation in this Republic must depend upon the honesty and the courage of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. [Applause.]

He and I have had some warm contests upon this floor. We did not attend the same school or study the same arithmetic, and we never could figure alike; but differing as we have, I can truthfully say that never once did he fail to insure to the minority members of the committee every right to which they were entitled. Never once has he taken advantage of me or of any other member of the committee. Never once has he failed to give us a square deal. [Applause.] He is a hard fighter, but I love a hard fighter when he is a fair fighter, and JIM GOOD is a fair fighter. [Applause.] I regret his leaving, because I believe, first, that it is a public misfortune when a man of his type leaves the public service. I regret it, too, because of my personal loss, for outside of our service on the committee he has been my personal friend. I value his friendship, and while the Government loses a faithful public servant, I am separated—I hope only temporarily—from my personal friend. Wherever he goes I know that he will carry with him the esteem and affection of every Member of this House, all of us feeling confident that the same qualifications that have won for him success in this House will win for him success in the profession to which he will now devote himself. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I join with those who have preceded me in the estimate they have pronounced upon the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee and our colleague, Hon. JAMES W. GOOD, as he retires from this body and from the chairmanship of that great committee. Our leader [Mr. MONDELL] said that it was impossible to measure the services of such a man, and so it is; and yet during the last three or four years we have heard a good deal of cost-plus contracts and of profits awarded to those who have performed service for their country upon the basis of 6 per cent, 8 per cent, or 10 per cent upon the work performed. We can not measure the public services of a man in this body upon any such basis. And yet if from all his services we were to take the sum that Chairman GOOD has been responsible in largest measure in saving to this country and allow him a percentage for his work, what an income it would be! If we were to take the more than $4,000,000,000 saved during the period of his chairmanship and allow him not 10 or 8 or 6 per cent but merely 1 per cent as his share in the way of a profit upon this vast sum saved to the American people, then as he walked from us to-day he would carry with him in his pocket a neat little check signed by Uncle Sam in the amount of more than $40,000,000 to be deposited to his credit as he opens his bank account in Chicago. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I approve most heartily of what has been said touching the industry and fidelity of our distinguished colleague. There is another thought, however, that I want to underscore and that has relation to his ability, referred to by my predecessor, to say "no" to a friend. Upon this floor friendship looms large. Members learn to know the worth of their fellows and to hold them in highest esteem. Members of this House are fond of JIM GOOD. He knows it. He realizes it. There is no Member of this body whose services are worth the paper upon which his certificate of election is written who is not proud of his own district, who does not somehow feel that his own State is, maybe, a little better than any other State, and his own part of the country blessed by Heaven a little above the other parts of the United States. He does not see the whole mosaic. He sees merely one little stone that enters into that mosaic. He goes to the chairman of the committee and he importunes him for appropriations and for consideration that can not be given to all the Members of this House, to all the districts, and to all the States. And Chairman GOOD, during the time he has been chairman, has had the responsibility of looking at the mosaic as a whole, at our country as a whole. He has time and time again been compelled to summon his courage and act in line with his sense of duty and say "no" to the best friend he had when "yes" did not measure up with the course that meant for highest patriotism and good faith toward the people of our Nation. To do this our chairman had to begin with the committee and with the organization within the committee.

Let me give one illustration: A little over a year ago you gave to the Appropriations Committee greater work in the matter of appropriations. You also gave to the committee an assistant clerk. Mr. GOOD went to the very efficient clerk of the committee, Mr. Sheild, and asked him to help hunt out the man to be assistant clerk. Mr. Sheild said, "What suggestion have you to make?" Mr. GOOD replied, "I have no suggestions," and then he turned and said, "Yes; the suggestions I have to make are these: As you hunt out the man I do not want you to choose anyone who by reason of his residence or by reason of any sort of personal attachment will have cause to think that I can look with favor upon any lack of efficiency or any course on his part that is not for the public good." Those of you who have seen the result know how carefully and well the mission was performed by Mr. Sheild in selecting the assistant clerk and how faithfully that charge was carried out. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, if every public official charged with responsibility of employing help were to take this course of conduct as a pattern, we could abolish our civil service, and there would be ushered into our administration of affairs such an era of efficiency as would challenge the admiration and the pride of every citizen of our Republic.

Mr. Speaker, there is much that I could add that would stress the value of the public services of this man. He goes from us to assume other responsibilities. I join with those who have spoken and the entire membership of this body in regret that he is leaving the public service of our country, and join, too, with my colleagues in the thought that we wish him the greatest good fortune in the new field of his endeavor. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, an hour like this makes us better men. It is a beautiful commentary on that regnant manhood which is always at a premium in this House that across the political lines that divide us we shake hands in golden fellowship and agree to put emphasis not on the things that divide us but on the things that unite us. Personally grateful for courtesies from the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and more than this, tremendously convinced that the Government is losing the personal services of a very faithful man and an able statesman, I felt that I would be recreant to a sacred and a grateful impulse if I let this hour pass without expressing my own brief word of appreciation.

Reference has been made to the gentle and yet definite manner in which Mr. GOOD has turned down his friends on appropriations so passionately desired, and I was thinking that if every man on the floor of this House whom he has turned down for patriotic reasons were to weep in his path to-day, he would float out of office on an ocean of tears. But, on the other hand, if every man to whom he has been courteous and to whose constituents he has been helpful were to scatter flowers in his path, he would walk in a bower of roses from Washington to his Iowa home. [Applause.] God bless JIM GOOD, and give him a "good" time as a God-fearing, useful man from now till the judgment day. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall occupy but a very few minutes on a subject that a man who is as familiar with the details as I am could talk for an hour or more. I have been in this Congress nine full terms and starting in on the tenth, and all the time since Mr. GOOD has been in Congress I have been associated with him. Nearly all these years I have been on the Appropriation Committee with him. I may say something commendatory of him before I get through, and not only may but will. I can not help but say so if I told the truth. I want to relate a little incident which will express my opinion of Mr. GOOD.

A few years ago, when I was in political life, a friend of mine in Minnesota came up for office, one of the highest offices in this country barring the Presidency. He had never been engaged in politics before. He came to my home city to address a county fair in which there were about 5,000 farmers present. He asked me, owing to my familiarity, to go down and introduce him to the audience. He was unknown to them politically. I did so. I advised him a little bit as to the kind of an argument I thought he ought to make. He was a lawyer by profession and had known nothing of farming, and still he was about to address 5,000 intelligent farmers. I said to him on the way down, "Now, sir, you are a great lawyer, but you know nothing about farming and this is a farm audience. You know much about transportation and all the men present are anxious to hear about it. Address yourself to that subject if you want to talk about something which they are interested in. You can not teach them farming, but you can tell them something about the transportation of their products."

He did so. It was the first forcible expression on this subject the audience had had. In conclusion I addressed 5,000 of my old friends. I said, "My fellow citizens, the little gentleman who has just addressed you, whose hair has grown gray in the practice of the law, came up and went into a law office in St. Paul a number of years ago unknown, but by constant hard work what is the result? Recently the great American Bar Association elected him as chairman of the Bar Association of the United States. That is what he attained, and now we are going to send him to the United States Senate. I do not say that he will become a Daniel Webster or a Henry Clay on the floor, but I do say that if you keep him there, as he succeeded at the bar by going to the top, he will certainly in a few years go to the top of the United States Senate."

Now, my friends, I was not familiar with my friend GOOD before he came to Congress, but I had heard of him as a lawyer, and when I met him here and became associated with him I said to myself it will not be very long before JAMES W. GOOD goes to the top. [Applause.]

He certainly has, not only to the top as regards the affection of this House, not only in consequence of his ability, but his modesty and integrity, and the whole American people at this time honor and revere the name of JAMES W. GOOD. [Applause.]

I did say at a little gathering a while ago in which Mr. GOOD participated that I was sorry, very sorry, that he was going to resign. I rather put it then on the fact that Congress had honored him and that he had honored Congress and that the Nation needed and demanded his services here. I was somewhat criticized for making that statement. Why? Because they told me then—and I know it now and believe it to be true—that a man's first duty is to his family; that, therefore, if any excuse is to be offered for deserting or quitting the great position he occupies in Congress, it is because he deems it his duty to take care of his family better than a man can who lives on his salary in Congress. God bless him when he goes to Chicago. As my friend MADDEN just said, he will have to compete with the best lawyers in the best city of the United States, but I will guarantee that JAMES W. GOOD in a very few years will go to the top of that bar and that you can not stop him. [Applause.] His reputation as chairman of this great committee will live many years. I have served with John J. Fitzgerald, a fine chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and with Mr. Sherley after that, and then with JAMES W. GOOD. Mr. GOOD is the equal and in many respects the superior of either of them. They were grand men, and I loved Fitzgerald and I loved Sherley, but I have never met a man in all my public career, and I have known many of them, that devoted his energy and talent more faithfully, more honestly, more patriotically to the duties than JAMES W. GOOD. God bless him! I hope to see him go to the top financially and otherwise in the near future. [Applause.]

Mr. JEFFERIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I can not let this moment pass without saying a few words. Thirty years ago JAMES GOOD and I were students at the University of Michigan. We became members of the same class, members of the same section of the class, and graduated together in 1893. All that has been said of him here to-day was displayed there then, only in a different field of activity. He was at all times active, possessed of the great energy that has carried him through these years to such success. He was a "boomer-lacker." That was our class yell. He could yell it with the rest of us, with all the vim and enthusiasm that he possessed.

Boomer-lacker, boomer-lacker,
Boom, boom, baw,
Michigan, Michigan,
'93-law!

When we separated 28 years ago, going out into the world, every member of the 321 young lawyers felt assured that we would hear from JIM GOOD, and I know that members of the class have the greatest pride and admiration for the sacrifice that he has made for 12 years of his life for his country's good, for the advancement of the cause of this great Nation, and they, like all loyal, true Americans of the Nation, join in wishing JAMES W. GOOD, for the balance of his life, all the happiness that it is possible for human kind to obtain on this terrestrial globe. [Applause.]

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess, subject to the call of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess, subject to the call of the Speaker. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

PROCEEDINGS DURING RECESS.

PRESENTATION OF SILVER SERVICE TO REPRESENTATIVE JAMES W. GOOD.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished and retiring colleague, Mr. GOOD, and Members of the House, a few days ago, when I was requested to assume the responsibilities of seeing to it that a material evidence of our appreciation of our retiring colleague was realized, I did so with some reluctance and hesitation. I feared that it would entail endless hours of hard work, and that I might, perchance, encounter caustic criticism and unkind comment; but I want to say to you, Mr. GOOD, that the endless hours of hard work which I feared were converted into a few short hours of my greatest pleasure, made possible in large measure by the willing cooperation of my colleagues, Mr. DARROW, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. GARRETT, of Tennessee, assisted by a representative of every State delegation of the House membership. Instead of encountering unkind criticism and comment, I say to you again, not a single one of your colleagues had anything but eulogies and regretful expressions to make at your departure. Had I the forethought to have kept in a memory book the many, many kind things that were said to me regarding you and your service, and were I this day and this hour to hand that to you, I would be giving to you a thing of value not purchasable by the aggregate wealth represented in this House.

A very ordinary man is sometimes called upon to endure hardships and distress to such a degree as to excite the admiration and respect of his fellow men, but I say, sirs, that it requires an extraordinary man to meet honor, success, and position, and still hold that same respect. But JIM GOOD—and I make bold to call you "JIM," not out of any spirit of familiarity but rather prompted by that kind, loving feeling that every man has in knowing you as a friend—I say to you, you are that extraordinary man, because you have met success, you have obtained position, you have received honor, and yet you have held the deepest respect and the warmest feeling of all your colleagues.

I am but the mouthpiece of the membership in the House, and as such I say to you on your retirement, Godspeed, and I now take pleasure in presenting to you this beautiful service as emblematic of all that I have said. In order that you may the longer remember your colleagues and the greater appreciate their friendships, we have chosen for you a gift usable only by the best of women, "your wife." [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Gentlemen, I suppose so long as our form of government remains as it is we shall have two major political bodies contesting for supremacy. At one time one will be in the majority and at another the other. I think all philosophic students of our form of government are agreed that two parties at least are necessary—a majority and a minority party. Of course I violate no confidence, Mr. Speaker, in telling the Members of the House that the people of the country are very rapidly coming to the conclusion that they made a great mistake in determining which should be the majority party last November. [Laughter.] I know many distinguished Republicans who have visited in the city of Washington since the 4th of March and who have recently returned to their homes who are very firmly of that opinion. There are others who still linger with us whose convictions on that subject are trembling in the balance. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is the most unique Republican in America to-day, and to many the most mysterious. He is voluntarily retiring from high official position. [Laughter.]

It has been my pleasure in cooperation with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW] to serve as a committee in securing and presenting to our colleague a symbol of the regard and respect which his colleagues entertain for him. This gift, which has been so well presented by the gentleman from Ohio, represents a personal tribute on the part of Mr. GOOD's colleagues, without regard to political affiliation, and expresses their appreciation of the service which in a highly responsible position in this great Government he has for the last three years so well performed. It goes to him with good wishes, with good will, for him and for his. It is hoped that it is of a character that will be appreciated not only by him but by those who are near and dear to him, and that it can properly be handed down to those who are to come after him in the line of his blood as a memento of the regard and respect which was entertained for him during his period of great service at a great era by the Members of this great body. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. My colleagues, I would be less than human if I failed to appreciate and comprehend the full meaning of your action to-day. The generous expression of the value of my services, the presentation of this beautiful gift, fill my heart with emotions that no words can express. To learn from you that I have accomplished something worth while for the House makes me glad. To learn from you, too, that I have accomplished something as a legislator that will live makes me happy. I should like to think that I deserve the commendation you have bestowed on me, for there could be no greater reward for public service than the knowledge of valuable work done, generously appreciated by men who themselves contributed much to its accomplishment.

It is not an easy thing to lay down and return to you the commission as chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations; it is not an easy thing to resign a commission given by a loyal constituency which has on seven different occasions, with increasing majority, and on the last election by a unanimous vote, returned me as their Representative to this House. If I consulted my own wishes alone, I would prefer to serve here in this forum rather than to give service in any other place in all the world.

If I have accomplished anything as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, it has been because of the loyal support, of the hard work, of the great industry of the clerks of that committee and of every member upon that committee. [Applause.] Much of the success, whatever it has been, of that committee is due not to the chairman but to the devotion and cooperation of every member of the committee, whether he sits on one side of the aisle or on the other, and for the industry and the cooperation of the committee I want to express my very great appreciation and sincere thanks.

I shall miss working with men like JOE BYRNS of Tennessee, with whom I have worked for 10 years. I sincerely hope that in the future the old historic policy of leaving all politics out of appropriations will be maintained and followed, and if the advice of my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is followed, that policy will be strictly adhered to.

Some few months ago I contemplated taking this action. It was not possible for me to do so then, and it is only possible now because certain things have been accomplished which were then incomplete. I had been requested by the majority leader and the Speaker to remain in Congress until the budget bill should become a law and until the deficiency bill should be enacted into law, which two things are now behind us. On this occasion I want to say to the membership of this House, as I go out into private life, that I shall take with me not only the great appreciation of what you have said, of your cooperation and help while I have been chairman of this great committee, but I shall leave with you the thanks of myself and of Mrs. Good for the handsome gift which you have presented to us.

As I go out I shall take with me a high appreciation of the membership of this the House of Representatives. [Applause.] I shall often think, of course, of my service here, my service with men who are mental giants, and who are doing the very best within the power of man to write upon the statute books of the Nation those laws that will bring about a more normal condition and that will more steadily advance the interests of their countrymen, and whenever opportunity shall be given to me I shall not fail to testify to the devotion to duty, the loyalty to our country, of the 435 Members of this House, and their desire and determination to do the right thing. [Applause.] In leaving I realize that I am leaving the greatest legislative body in all the world. I am leaving a body which has grown to be the conservative branch of Congress. The founders of the Republic in creating the House of Representatives thought that this would be the aggressive and may be the wasteful branch of the Congress, and that the Senate would be the conservative branch, but the demonstration of the last two years shows changes wrought by time; to-day you are the guardians of the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.] And while two appropriation bills remain unacted upon for the next year I leave without hesitation, because I know that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], in charge of the Army bill, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], in charge of the naval bill, intend to see to it that that degree of economy written in the bills by this House shall remain the measure of economy when those bills are signed by the President. [Applause.] And I warn those gentlemen now that if they bring those bills back with increased appropriations they will be in difficulty, or if they come before this House and ask for continuing resolutions without decreasing the amount carried in the pending bills in all likelihood they will have trouble in passing such continuing resolutions. Therefore, my friends and colleagues, in taking leave of you I want to say I shall often think of you, of the great duty that you are to perform, for there never were greater obligations placed upon a legislative body than are placed upon the Congress of the United States, and for that work you have my prayers. I thank you. [Great applause, the Members rising.]

AFTER THE RECESS.

The SPEAKER (at 12 o'clock and 29 minutes). The House will resume its session.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the record of the proceedings during the recess may be inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the proceedings during the recess shall be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

TERMINATION OF WAR.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 110.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider in the House S. J. Res. 16, as amended by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, "terminating the state of war between the Imperial German Government and the United States of America and between the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government and the United States of America." The amendment reported by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs as a substitute for S. J. Res. 16 shall be read in extenso. General debate shall continue on the said resolution as amended until 5 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, June 11, 1921, the time to be controlled, one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. PORTER, and one-half by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. FLOOD. At the conclusion of the general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on S. J. Res. 16 and on the amendment as reported by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time, so as not to cause any discussion or anxiety, to move to amend the resolution by fixing the hour at 4.30 p. m. on Monday next, instead of 5 o'clock to-day, for a vote upon the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 12, strike out the words "Saturday, June 11, 1921," and insert in lieu thereof "Monday, June 13, 1921," and in line 11 strike out "5" and insert in lieu thereof "4.30."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask the gentleman from North Carolina about the time he desires for debate on the resolution or the adoption of the rule?

Mr. POU. I hope very much the gentleman from Kansas will ask for an hour on a side. There is to be a contest against the rule, and demands on this side have been such that I do not see how we can get along with less than an hour on a side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, I take it that the discussion will turn largely on the peace resolution rather than upon the rule during the time that is allotted to the gentleman from North Carolina and myself.

Mr. POU. They are both so intimately related that the discussion will necessarily apply to both, but I think, in view of the fact that there is to be two days' debate, an hour on a side for the discussion of the rule is quite reasonable.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? There are Members on this side—I know of one and I take it there are several—who are in favor of this peace resolution so far as the declaration of the ending of the state of war is concerned, but who are opposed to the conditions or reservations, whatever they may be called, which they regard as an invasion of the treaty-making power. Now, it seems to me that on this rule gentlemen who hold that view ought to be allowed at least a few minutes in opposition to the rule. I would ask for 15 minutes for myself, because I am one of those who believe that this resolution should pass except as to those amendments, and I should like to present to this House reasons why this rule should not be adopted in such a form as to exclude from the House the power to amend it. I do not see how I can ask either side for the time, and I must ask it from the House.

Mr. POU. If I yield the gentleman from New York 15 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas would do the same, would that be satisfactory?

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, entirely so.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from New York only asks for 15 minutes.

Mr. POU. The gentleman desires 30 minutes.

Mr. COCKRAN. I have one foot on land and one foot on sea; I have one foot on that side of the aisle and one foot on this, and the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina is that the gentleman from Kansas yield me 15 minutes also.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the gentleman from New York will not intimate that he is between the devil and the deep sea.

Mr. COCKRAN. I have never associated with the gentleman, the devil. I prefer to regard the gentleman from Kansas himself as my angel.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman 15 minutes out of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the rule be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and one-half by myself, and that at the conclusion of the debate on the rule the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that there shall be two hours of debate on the rule, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have only this to say about the rule itself: It gives two legislative days to the consideration of a resolution declaring a state of war between Germany and the United States and Austria and the United States at an end. I doubt if many citizens of the Republic think there should be anything like that much debate upon the question. Very few people feel that it is a debatable question at all. But the Committee on Rules, in providing the machinery for the consideration of the question, thought we could devote two legislative days to a discussion of it on account of its importance.

That there should be peace between the Governments with which we have been at war and the United States there is no question. That our diplomatic and consular agents should be at the capitals and in the commercial centers of the countries with which we are now practically at peace but technically at war there is no question. We should resume the same relations with these our former enemies that those who were associated with us in this war have long since resumed with them.

Now, the controverted question, so far as the rule is concerned, is upon the question of whether or not the resolution declaring war at an end should be open for amendment. The resolution declaring that the state of war is at an end has been carefully prepared in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with particular emphasis placed by the members of that committee upon the importance of the phraseology they have adopted in the resolution. Every right, every interest, and every concern of the country has been in the minds of those who have prepared the phraseology of the resolution. And I doubt if upon the floor a single word could be changed that would advance the interests of the country or the welfare of the Republic. These are the reasons why we have provided that at the conclusion of the debate upon this resolution it should be voted upon as prepared by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which committee has devoted their energy and their best judgment to the phraseology and the terms of the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York 15 minutes also.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas has stated the proposition before the House so clearly that it relieves me from the necessity of occupying any time in further defining it. He tells us with engaging though somewhat cynical frankness that the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Foreign Affairs have agreed among themselves that this resolution as it is now framed can not be improved, and therefore that the House should have no opportunity to attempt improvement of it by adopting or even considering any amendment whatever.

Mr. Speaker, Walter Bagehot in that one of his numerous works which deals with the English House of Commons as it existed 30 years ago, after describing it as the most extraordinarily successful political body that ever existed, attributed in large degree its steady growth in power and consequence from very humble beginnings to supreme power in the British political sphere to the very general belief in Parliament and out of it that the house is always wiser than any of its members. The gentleman from Kansas has given us abundant reason for applying that conception to this body. I have no doubt that he believes this resolution, as it comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, embodies all the wisdom that can be expressed on paper.

But while I am willing to concede that the gentleman from Kansas is wiser than anybody in this House, I can not concede that he is wiser than everybody in this House. The Committee on Rules and the Committee on Foreign Affairs may embody the highest capacity ever possessed by committees. But, taken together, these gentlemen constitute but a small part of our membership, and I am unwilling to admit that so small a fraction of the House outweighs in wisdom and discretion the whole House. I think it safe to say that the rule now proposed, as its scope and purpose were explained by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], constitutes a gross affront to the dignity of the House and a wanton libel upon its intelligence. For if what the gentleman says be true, and we have here in this proposal as it is submitted to us the embodiment, concentration, and expression of all wisdom, what kind of a House would it be if we failed to recognize that fact? And, of course, recognition of its excellence must impel us to vote down every attempt to change it by amendment. When the gentleman comes in here and declares that this resolution must be passed in these precise terms in order that the House will be prevented from even considering, much less deciding, for itself the conditions under which it will dispose of a matter so important as this resolution—ending a state of war—in my judgment he discloses the reason for that decline in the importance of this House which for several years has been noticed by all Americans and lamented by many of them.

Mr. Speaker, what are we asked to do by adopting this rule? We are invited to write ourselves down incapable of discharging the functions imposed upon us by the Constitution. It may be that this Porter joint resolution is the highest expression of wisdom ever framed by mortal man, and therefore that it is incapable of improvement, as the gentleman from Kansas asserts. But it is for us to make that decision, not for him. Under our system of government we are not merely authorized—we are required to take control of all our proceedings, and we are responsible to the people for everything done by this body, whether it be done under restraint of a rule such as this or by the free action of the House. What you are asked to do, Members of the House, by the adoption of this rule is to declare formally and deliberately that you are unfit to deal with the most important question that can come before you this session, unless you are first manacled by a rule restraining you from freely and fully exercising powers which the Constitution confers on you. I should not say "manacled," because manacles involve restraint of energies that might be formidable to others. Rather we are asked to write ourselves down fit subjects for the strait-jacket, by which lunatics and imbeciles are prevented from doing damage to themselves. [Laughter.]

Was ever proposal so outrageous submitted to a representative body in the whole range of parliamentary history? I can not believe the House will receive it favorably or even patiently.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that I think this course of procedure now proposed explains largely the decline in the importance of this House. I do not think anybody will dispute that it has declined seriously and with ever-growing rapidity during the last 20 years.

These events which have occurred here to-day are a striking illustration of it. One of our most distinguished Members—at least a man who was of our membership until just a few moments ago—quits this body amid universal regret, and I am inclined to believe that he quits it not solely for the additional emoluments which he can obtain in professional life. I believe he is also governed by an idea that he can obtain higher consequence politically as well as financially outside the House than in it.

And I think that idea is entirely reasonable, yet it was not always so. My recollection of this House extends over a span longer than a quarter of its entire existence. I have known it since the Fiftieth Congress. And when I saw Mr. GOOD leave here, amid the plaudits of this gathering—and, I rather suspect, with a feeling on the part of most of us that he was doing better for himself by quitting this floor than by remaining on it—my memory went back to that Fiftieth Congress, when men in every walk of life, the most conspicuous and successful, were eager to exchange the most flattering prospects of profit for the honor of participation in congressional life.

In those days Roswell P. Flower, one of the most promising bankers in New York; John K. Cowen, of Baltimore, one of the most conspicuous lawyers in the country; Isidor Straus, of the firm of R. H. Macey & Co., among the largest retail merchants in the world, and countless others of the highest distinction in the various fields of commerce and the learned professions, were glad to renounce pursuit of profit in order to enjoy the distinction of membership in this body. And not merely men renowned in the professions and men high in financial circles, but journalists, the most conspicuous of their order, notwithstanding that they enjoyed access to vast audiences through the columns of their papers, were glad to abandon the editorial chair for a seat on this floor. I will not undertake to weary you with long lists of names. I will just remind you that Joseph Pulitzer, who acquired the New York World when it was a mere circular of doubtful manners and made it one of the most valuable newspapers in the world; Henry Watterson, the knightliest figure that ever entered the lists of journalistic controversy [applause]; Henry J. Raymond, if not the founder of the New York Times, at least the architect of its fortune, are among the names upon our rolls. And well might these men sacrifice profits, however extensive, for the association which election to this House in those days conferred upon them.

To go back no further than the Fiftieth Congress, I myself remember that the names of the men who led both sides were familiar everywhere as household words. How many names of Members of this House are known to-day outside their own districts?

Mr. Chairman, when I came to this House in the Fiftieth Congress reports and descriptions of our proceedings occupied the front page of every newspaper in America. When I returned to the Fifty-eighth Congress, after an absence of 8 years, I found that the space allotted to us in the newspapers had shrunk to about a column. I return now, after an absence of 12 years, and find we have no place at all. [Laughter.] Accounts of our proceedings are not accorded in the newspapers to-day as much space as a ball given by a fashionable woman.

Recall to mind, Mr. Speaker, the names of a few among the men who were conspicuous in the Fiftieth Congress, and who would not, I believe, have exchanged their prominence here for any other place in the whole world: John G. Carlisle, Roger Q. Mills, the two Breckinridges, William L. Wilson, Benton McMillin—on this side. On that side Thomas B. Reed. [Applause.]

Well may you cheer. I love to hear his name cheered on both sides, for not merely was he the most conspicuous figure of this House, which his genius adorned, his wit delighted, and his philosophy instructed, but he was a glorious ornament to the public life of this country and a shining intellectual light to all nations of the world. I may mention also William McKinley. [Applause.] And I could run through a long list of names famous in our history. But it would be superfluous. They are familiar to all of you.

How many of the Members around me now are known to the country at large? I repeat this question with mournful realization that the answer can not inspire us with pride in our situation.

Why has this House shrunk so low in public esteem? Why are our proceedings no longer important enough to obtain even mention in the newspapers? Why are gentlemen, as soon as they reach a conspicuous place here, ready to give up that which formerly was the dearest aspiration of genius and patriotism in order to seek elsewhere success which they consider more valuable and more creditable? I will tell you. It is because by rules and procedure such as this you have so hampered the House that it has sunk into incapacity and therefore has ceased to be regarded seriously by the people. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Good], who has just left us, said truly that under the Constitution as planned by the framers it was intended that this House would be the controlling force of our Republic, and it was the dominant feature until within the last 20 years.

It was upon this floor and in this House that the reputations were established of the greatest political leaders in our history. Not one was ever established in the Senate. Not in the Senate but in the House did Henry Clay win the renown on which his authority rested. Here also did James G. Blaine acquire the popularity which made mention of his name in any Republican gathering an occasion for demonstration of affections that was absolutely rapturous. Neither Blaine nor Clay ever succeeded in reaching the Presidency, but they remained, while they lived, the idols, objects of adoration to their respective parties, embracing nearly one-half of the people. I myself saw and heard William J. Bryan emerge by a single speech on the floor from the position of a new and unknown Member to a degree of prominence which led to his nomination three times for the Presidency and to domination of his party for 20 years.

Why are no successors to these giants produced by our proceedings now? What is it that has atrophied this House—reduced it to such sterility? I have heard it said that the reason for this decline of the House in importance is a decline in the ability of its Members. Nothing, in my judgment, could be further from the truth. I have known the House for 34 years, and now on my return, after an absence of 12 years, I have been profoundly impressed and immensely cheered by the high order of ability displayed in debate on this floor.

On this very day we heard speeches, impromptu, extemporaneous, delivered from both sides, that were models of lucid composition and forceful expression. And it has been from the younger men in this House that I have heard the best forensic displays since my return.

There should be open to every one of you here the same opportunity that came to Blaine, that came to Bryan, that came in the early days to Henry Clay. Abilities just as shining are possessions not of a few but of many among you. Especially the younger men. What you lack is a theater for exercising them equally favorable. Of this you are deprived by rules and procedures which have emasculated the House.

In the early years of this Republic the Senate was a club, in which courtesy was carried to perfection. This House was the popular forum where public opinion was expressed and largely formed. To-day these conditions are reversed. The Senate has become all powerful. The House has declined till it is a negligible quantity. Is this an exaggeration? What effect have you on public opinion to-day? These speeches which are of the highest excellence—which in other days would have been widely read—are nowhere reported. Not even the fact that they were delivered is mentioned in the newspaper press.

And why should it be otherwise under existing conditions—conditions of your own creation—for which you yourselves are responsible? By rules and by procedure which you have sanctioned you have renounced and thrown away the powers which the Constitution conferred upon you and upon which your consequence depended. The powers thrown away by this body did not go into the air waiting perhaps for us to rejoin them in heaven. They have been seized by another body. The powers of government are inherent. They can not be abolished while the Government survives. They can not even be suspended. Where they are not exercised by one agency they are always exercised by another; and we, who have thrown away our own powers by a succession of rules conceived in distrust of our own capacity, find them seized and exercised by the Senate. The abasement to which this House has sunk by comparison with the other House was strikingly illustrated in the recent debate on the emergency tariff bill, when the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee actually proclaimed here on this floor that the revenue measure we were then considering must not be amended in any way, because the Senate had forbidden this House to change a single word of the draft which it had been pleased to sanction in advance of its submission to us. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, how could this House retain any consequence in the body politic when its own Members not merely fail to defend its powers but actually throw them under the feet of another body which has not hesitated to seize them and exercise them?

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes; with great pleasure.

Mr. HERRICK. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks his method of biting the hand that feeds him is a proper method of showing his appreciation and gratitude therefor?

Mr. COCKRAN. When the gentleman's meaning becomes clear to the average intellect I will undertake to answer his question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERRICK. I should like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I can indulge the gentleman in one exhibition, but two would become tiresome or worse. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the powers of every representative body and therefore the degree of its importance in any political system always depends upon its control of the purse. The original purpose of representative bodies was not legislation. Legislation was not even a part of their powers. Representative bodies were assembled originally for the sole purpose of levying taxes to provide revenue for support of the king. It was by imposition of conditions upon those grants of revenue or supply that the power of legislation was acquired by representative bodies. When the framers of our Constitution, with the history of parliamentary evolution before them, gave to this House of Representatives control of the purse they gave it everything essential to maintain it as the dominant feature of this Government. But no grant of power can be effective unless the body on which it is conferred exercises it. The power conferred on us we have thrown away.

We have thrown it away by a series of ill-considered rules. The culmination of them is this proposal now pending here, in which we are asked not indeed to allow aggression from outside but actually to write ourselves down with our own hands—that is to say, by our votes—as incapable of exercising the powers, performing the duties, and discharging the functions which the Constitution imposes on us. Who would care to retain membership in a House that could deliberately, solemnly record such a judgment of itself? At present this proposal of the Committee on Rules may be considered a libel on the House. I believe it is a gross libel. If you reject this resolution, it will always remain a libel. If you adopt this rule, it becomes a description, the accuracy of which can not be disputed, because you yourselves will have accepted it. If there be any justification for the existence of such a House as this one will declare itself to be by adopting this rule, it must be for the amusement of the thoughtless. It can not be for edification of the patriotic. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the House, to the whole House, to all its Members, not to put this crowning stigma upon itself. Here is a measure, the most important that has ever come before the House, as I have said. The minority members of the Foreign Affairs Committee have filed a report stating that there is no power in Congress to declare peace.

A large number of the minority, however, believe that power does exist, but they are opposed to its exercise at this time. Others—I myself among them—believe that the power does exist and that it should be exercised, but we believe also that these reservations, conditions, stipulations, whatever they may be called—I never knew any two gentlemen on the other side to agree on a description of them—in fact, amount to a treaty or an attempt to prescribe conditions for a treaty, and this Congress has no power to do. Those of us who hold that view believe that any condition imposed upon a declaration of peace, any agreement, whatever it may be called, or any proposal for an agreement between two countries, looking to action of any kind by either or both of them is, in the very nature of things, a treaty and can not be anything else. Some gentlemen contend that these reservations or stipulations embodied in the Parker resolution would not be a treaty. If they are not a treaty or a proposal for a treaty, they are nothing. If they have any significance at all, they are proposals for an agreement between this country and Germany, and in that case I believe they amount to an invasion of the treaty-making power, which we have no right to attempt. If they mean nothing, they are a blemish, an excrescence upon the resolution, which for lucidity of expression and propriety of conduct should be expunged from it at once.

Now, we would like to present that view to the House and discuss it. I, for one, am eager to vote for a resolution declaring the war at an end. But while I want to do it, I do not want to be placed in a position by the Committee on Rules where I must choose between voting to exercise a power which the Constitution has imposed on us and voting to invade a dominion which the Constitution forbids us to enter. Under this proposed rule I am not allowed to obey the Constitution according to my conception of its directions, injunctions, and prohibitions. I may be wrong in this. I am perfectly willing to take the judgment of the House as the Constitution directs us to do. I am not one of those who believe that a Member is justified in evading a duty by reason of a constitutional scruple. I am perfectly willing to submit this objection to the judgment of the House. But by the rule now proposed you do not allow us to invoke the judgment of the House. This resolution is framed to prevent the House from deciding this question. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] says so himself. He says you are not fit to decide it. You can not be allowed to review the judgment of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and of the gentleman from Kansas. They have exhausted wisdom, and anything in the way of sound judgment you might possess must be an overflow or remnant of their superabundance that would not be worth invoking. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, is it any wonder that the House, to which such a proposal as this has been submitted, should have sunk in consequence? Is it any wonder that gentlemen who have achieved distinction in it are willing to leave it? Is it any wonder that men eminent in finance, commerce, and the professions, men of the class who were struggling and competing for admission to this House 35 years ago, would not consider for a moment accepting an election to it now? You all know this to be true. Yet I see here a higher degree of ability than I think the House ever possessed before. I am not speaking alone of the proceedings to-day. I am profoundly impressed and greatly heartened by the ability displayed by the younger Members in every debate. I say in perfect frankness that I have not heard a stupid speech since I came here this time. When I was here before I heard few that were not stupid. [Laughter.] The House has wonderfully changed its character, and for the better, not alone in the merit of its debates but in its methods of conducting business. In those old days when the desks were here men sat scattered all over the Hall at immense distances from the Speaker, lured by those desks to correspondence and other activities, distracting their attention from the business under consideration. A man who undertook to deliver a speech generally read it. Practically all the others took refuge in flight from the dreariness of his periods. Members did not pretend to address their colleagues. Their speeches were directed to their constituents, and the House acted in accordance with that condition. The House was polite. It always is. It gave the man who took the floor the attendance of the Speaker, of the Clerk, of the official reporters; it gave him everything but attention. That it reserved for its favorites. [Laughter.] To-day I find the daily attendance largely increased, Members gathered together within range of the man's voice who is speaking, and the speakers have risen to the opportunity afforded by this closer attention.

It has been said that we do not have now the tremendously important speeches that were formerly delivered. I think we have just as many good ones, and I know the average is better than ever. But the Member delivering a meritorious speech no longer receives the same degree of credit; no longer accomplishes equal progress on the road to fame. Who cares about a speech delivered here upon any question while the House itself by resolution solemnly declares that it is not fit to discuss matters of great importance? Who will pay attention to any speech delivered in such a body? The importance of a speech does not depend wholly on the words that compose it, but largely upon the effect it produces or can produce. What weight, consideration, or value can attach to a speech however excellent its composition or delivery when the body to which it is addressed is incapable of acting on it? This House, under the rule now proposed, can not decide the question of meritorious importance—whether the reservations embodied in the Porter joint resolution are or are not invasions of the treaty-making power. All that is safely attended to by the gentleman from Kansas. This House is securely guarded from going wrong by denying it the right to go anywhere. [Laughter.] I implore Members on both sides, especially the young Members, to consider what they are asked to do, and pause before they adopt this resolution.

It may be said that reason of convenience justify this proposed rule; that without it proceedings will be unduly delayed. This House has never been left free to dispose of a measure that it did not do so rapidly and intelligently. When the illustrious gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was Speaker of the House in the Sixtieth Congress, the most important measure of that session was the Hepburn rate bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was in charge of it, and he declined to accept any shackles for the House. That bill was a comprehensive measure, a complex one, a difficult one, yet in the course of a few days it passed this body and was over in the Senate. Many amendments—probably 50—had been proposed to it. They were all fully considered, and, as I recollect it, not one was adopted. Can not the House be trusted now on this measure of greater importance to act with equal wisdom, moderation, and expedition? To you younger Members of the House I want to address a final appeal. Many of you have shown possession of sufficient ability to warrant expectation that you might match the career of any Clay or Blaine who has ever won fame and leadership in this House. But the House, held up by rules which abase its credit and consequence, does not afford you the same opportunity to show your qualities, to exercise them for the benefit of your country.

It is well, not merely for you but for the country, that this proposal be voted down now and that a beginning be made of ending the system of preventing the House from exercising its own full, free, unfettered judgment on every matter of importance with which it is authorized or required by the Constitution to deal. You are the House; you are the majority. Do not think that your youth is any disqualification for assuming leadership. I think it entirely safe to say that this is the age and the opportunity for the young man. The world is passing through a crisis which has never had a parallel. The events before us can not be measured or judged by any that are behind us. In ordinary times old men are best fitted for counsel. When the world is at peace and it is reasonably certain that the future will be a repetition of the past, that to-morrow will be like yesterday, those old men who can recall the events of many yesterdays are best fitted to advise.

But in these days when no man can foresee the future, and all we can realize is that whatever is about to occur will be different from anything that has ever occurred before, then is the occasion for young men, instinct with the life of their generation, who if they can not quite discern conditions that are approaching can at least sense them to some extent through that sympathy and understanding with the aspirations, the ideals, the virility of their time, which is the characteristic of youth to come forward and give direction to troubled, staggering, grievously perplexed social order. They should at least be heard on measures of this transcendent importance with as much weight as their elders. [Applause.]

I appeal, Mr. Speaker, not alone to the younger of my colleagues, but to every Member of this House, for cooperation in saving its dignity from this affront; its efficiency from this attempt to impair it. I invoke in its behalf the memory of the mighty dead whose fame was established on this floor. I appeal most earnestly to you of my own generation which is passing, as well as to this young generation which is approaching, to restore the privileges of the House which have been imperiled and its powers which have been in great measure thrown away. And as a first step in that direction I urge you to vote down this proposal, defeat of which will go a long way toward ending this intolerable system.

You have had a forum where great reputations can be made and brilliant careers initiated, where also the highest interests of the country can be most effectively served. It rests with you to make this body what it should be. All you need do to restore its dignity is to take it from the abasement into which these shortsighted rules have thrust it and raise it to the eminence which the Constitution intended for it. [Applause.] The power is there. It needs but determination on your part to use it in order that this House may once more be the finest, the most valuable, the most splendid feature of the political system which is embodied in the flag that floats over our heads. By restoring the dignity of this House you will advance the highest interests of the country, and at the same time you will advance your own prospects of achieving creditable careers by rendering this service of immeasurable value to the Nation, whose commission you hold, and whose citizenship you adorn. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, one of the famous utterances of Gladstone was his comment upon his own energy as a member of the House of Commons in discussing questions that came before that body. That comment was frequently repeated by other members. It was to the effect that it mattered not how little of importance any measure was, if he were called upon to discuss it he always threw all the force that he had into it. I can not help thinking that the comment made by the famous English statesman is splendidly exemplified by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. I am just thinking how fortunate it was that the Committee on Rules omitted to say anything about tieing up the House, as was suggested by the gentleman from New York. It was not there considered to be sufficiently important to even be mentioned, and think of it! Had it not been that this matter has come from the Committee on Rules without any such objection we never would have had this wonderful bit of oratory to which we have listened, from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CANTRILL. The gentleman does not mean to make the statement that this rule was reported from the Rules Committee without objection?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. CANTRILL. I would put that construction on the remarks of the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman does not mean that the Democratic Members supported the rule. They did not.

Mr. CANTRILL. I wanted to have that clear.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman means that the question raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] was not even mentioned in the Rules Committee. That is what the gentleman means. Our Democratic friends were there and voted, of course.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I dislike to take issue with my friend, but I have a very distinct recollection of very specific attention being called to that matter in the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FESS. Well, I am rather of the opinion that it is not worth while for me as a member of the Committee on Rules to prolong a controversy of that sort on the floor of the House, simply because the conduct of the committee affairs had probably better not be mentioned on the floor of the House; but if my friends on the Democratic side want to leave the impression by these interruptions they have made to me that they made any opposition to this rule on the point that it does not admit of an amendment, my memory is very short. The truth about the matter is that we wanted to remedy an intolerable situation, a technical continuance of war two and one-half years after actual war had ended. The Rules Committee was called upon to make that possible. The last Congress passed such a resolution, only to be defeated by presidential veto. The Senate has again acted upon a resolution. It came to the House, and the House committee saw fit to amend the Senate resolution, and this amended resolution came before the Committee on Rules after the Foreign Affairs Committee reported the resolution with a single amendment. We were asked to make the Senate resolution with House amendment in order for the House. That is the purpose of the rule now before us. There was no contention as to the details of it. While I rose to discuss the rule under proper consideration, I would like now to call attention to what the gentleman from New York has said. We all are edified whenever he speaks. I myself have been a reader of the eloquence of this distinguished New York statesman for 30 years, and I very well remember one of the most historic debates that probably has taken place in the metropolis of the Middle West from a sound-money basis, where he was in a contest with the distinguished leader whose name he mentioned with so much eulogy a few moments ago. It was the days when Mr. Bryan was at the apex of his surprising popularity. Mr. COCKRAN's speech was one of the most powerful presentations of what I regard as sound finance I have ever read at any time. I mention this to indicate to you that the membership of the House listens with much respect and great delight whenever he addresses the House, but I do not believe that he is accurate when he alleges that the House of Representatives has essentially deteriorated to the point that its proceedings are not being reported by the press of the country. I might confess that speeches delivered here are not generally reported by the press, but it is not because the speeches were not important to the speaker who uttered them, nor especially the weakness of the speaker, but I think all will agree that under general debate we are too frequently speaking simply upon measures of interest to our own local communities, rather than to the United States at large, where we localize rather than nationalize our utterances here on the floor. Members will admit that general debate in a sense has deteriorated on that ground, and for that reason. It explains the lack of interest of our colleagues in the Chamber and also the failure to secure recognition by the press, for no one should find complaint that the utterances that are purely local do not find space in the press of the country.

When the gentleman says that we are bending to the Senate, and are therefore deteriorating as a body, it strikes me that this very resolution is a most distinct denial conclusive of that statement. [Applause on the Republican side.] While I agree with him, and to this the membership of the House will agree in the main, that the treaty-making function is with the President and the Senate, it will not be overlooked that this resolution is not a treaty, and there is no pretension of such. The House of Representatives has not entered upon treaty making, but it does have some interest in the financial obligations entailed by treaties. That right arises when the treaty entails upon the country an expenditure of money, since all bills for raising revenues must originate in the House. If a bill to raise the money must originate in the House, the House does have a constitutional right to say whether or no the money to satisfy the claim of the treaty shall be allowed or not. [Applause on the Republican side.] I know it is true that we have always done that in the past, although the question has often been discussed. If we take it from what we have done probably Members will say we have no choice, but the fact is that because we always do appropriate the money called for by the treaty which is entered into is not a conclusive evidence that we have no choice as to whether we shall appropriate the specified amount of money or not. In that sense the House has something to do with the matter of treaty enforcement, because the money that comes from the people to satisfy the terms of the treaty must come originally from action in this House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

UMI

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman contend that the House and the House exclusively originates appropriation bills?

Mr. FESS. The House originates appropriation bills or all bills for raising revenue.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But does not the gentleman see a marked distinction between a revenue bill and an appropriation of that revenue?

Mr. FESS. Technically there is a difference, but the House is the body that raises the revenue, and thereby ought to be the House that shall initiate the appropriation bills.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought that the gentleman did not wish to be misunderstood. My understanding is that the Constitution prescribes that the House shall exclusively originate all revenue bills, but the Constitution does not require the House exclusively to originate appropriation bills.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is absolutely correct in his statement and he is not instructing the gentleman on the floor, who understands the constitutional provision to which he alludes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not mean to instruct the gentleman, but I thought the gentleman's language was not very clear; he said the House exclusively originated appropriation bills.

Mr. FESS. Well, it does in practice.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I take issue with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I shall yield myself five additional minutes. The gentleman who now has the floor does not want to be misunderstood. The practice is that the appropriation bills come from the body whose constitutional function it is to originate the revenue bills. Now, that does not mean that a revenue bill the House sends to the Senate can not be amended by that body. Whatever may be the purpose of the founders as to that power that is not the practice, and therefore when the Senate does amend revenue bills it is acting within its function, and is not usurping our powers, although in practice we think it goes beyond the range of the original purpose of our Constitution makers. The point I wanted to call attention to was that the House of Representatives is not lending its judgment to the Senate, except where the House clearly concedes the superior contention of that body on items of legislation. When the gentleman, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, made the statement some time ago on the emergency tariff bill to which the gentleman from New York alluded, it referred to a gentlemen's agreement. Probably that statement made in the open was unfortunate, because it was misinterpreted, and Members for the sake of argument took advantage of it. But the actual fact about that legislation proved that the House did not in that case submit to the Senate. They submitted in conference to an item or two, but the bill was finally enacted as it went from the House. The same thing will be shown in the Army bill, I believe, when we reach a final vote upon it. The same thing will also be shown in the Navy bill. The House of Representatives is charged by a stupendous vote of confidence with protection against extravagance, and it will perform its functions without regard to any domination of any other branch of the Government.

Now, gentlemen of the House, we promised, through the man who now presides over the United States, that a peace resolution would be signed as quickly as the Congress could pass it. That pledge was made in good faith, since it was our only alternative to the Wilson surrender. Our efforts to end the war last session were defeated. We told the country we would end this intolerable situation as soon as possible after we came into power.

We came into power on the 4th of March. This is the 11th of June. The country expects us to keep the pledge, and many are impatient because of delay. Mr. Speaker, Europe was in a caldron that was burning. At an early stage the Senate took up the question and acted upon the peace resolution; it came over to the House. There had been for some time much concern over the European situation, the tardiness in finally and definitely fixing the indemnity Germany was to pay as fixed by the Allies and accepted by Germany. Everybody must recognize that we, associated with the Allies, did not want to take any step that could give the Central Powers any hope that we would be willing to relieve them of their obligations or that we would in any way embarrass the European situation that was not yet settled. And for that as one reason there was some question as to expediency of speedy action. But the indemnity is settled. We have actual peace, but technical war, which shuts out the fruits of peace. The country is impatient; the Congress is impatient. Democrat and Republican alike want to end this intolerable situation of a war continuing nearly three years after it is over. Republicans, now responsible, want to end it, not alone because it was promised and the country expects that promise to be kept, but because in addition to that we are in the intolerable condition of not having diplomatic and trade relations with the Governments with which we are actually at peace and technically at war, while Europe, technically at peace and actually in war in many places is reaping the benefits of peace to our great disadvantage. This unsettled situation, working untold harm to our own country, is an additional reason why there must be action taken.

Our Democratic friends say it would have been done if the Versailles treaty had been ratified. That answer does not go now. It was shot to death in the battle of ballots by 7,000,000 majority only last November, and that ended it. [Applause on the Republican side.] It requires a rare kind of courage to refer to the League of Nations treaty as a proper remedy. There is no use of talking about that particular phase of it. Our former Chief Executive had the treaty so tied up that in order to safeguard American rights by the usual treaty stipulations we were not only requested but commanded to surrender American sovereignty. He made it plain that his covenant must be accepted or else there would be no peace. We propose not to surrender American sovereignty. That decision was decisive and final. Neither do we propose to accept the other alternative, continue a state of war. But we are going to end this war, maintain American rights in the premises, and at the same time preserve both our sovereignty and independence as a Nation. [Applause on the Republican side.] We can not now ratify the treaty under the condition that was required by Mr. Wilson at the price he demanded, whatever might have been our freedom before the election; that would be clearly impossible now, since the country has delivered its verdict. The Nation has had ample opportunity since that day to note the dangers from which it escaped when it refused to enter that caldron. This resolution merely makes the law conform with the actual facts of peace. It removes the technical obstructions in the way of resuming our diplomatic and trade relations which thus far are blocked, while all other Governments are taking advantage of us by extending their commerce with these recent enemies.

Our simple duty is first to end the war. It must be done in such a way that we will preserve all the rights that are still with us; rights that we had before the war. It must be done in such a way as to secure all the rights that came to us as the result of the war. It must preserve the rights to which we are entitled as an associate power in the war. It must cover our rights arising out of acts of Congress. In fact, the resolution preserves our rights from whatever source. We will not surrender any. And while we so propose to preserve these rights by resolutions, we obviate the dangers of the Wilson covenant by preserving American sovereignty and independence.

Mr. Speaker, this rule opens the way to end the war and secure every right against any conflict that may come in the entanglement of diplomatic relations. It is a simple duty we are called upon to perform, and no criticism should have weight when placed upon the ground that we are refusing to allow an amendment. The rule ought to be and will be passed as it is reported. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the House should not be denied the right of amending a proposition as important to thousands of American people as the pending resolution, especially as this resolution has been brought before the House by the Committee on Foreign Affairs without any hearings at all.

The power of legislating in this House has passed into the hands of an invisible governing body—the Republican steering committee—which has more autocratic power and which exercises that power in a more despotic manner than was exercised in the days of the Cannon régime by the courtesy of gentlemen who then controlled the House.

The intelligence of no man, the patriotism of no man, is worth anything upon this floor except so far as it may serve by the speeches he may make to arouse the conscience of the country.

Under the system of special rules, which are brought in by the Committee on Rules, by the direction of the steering committee, this House has become a mere moot court, in which the only privilege left to a vast majority of its Members, Republicans as well as Democrats, is to make a speech for or against some legislation which is a foregone conclusion.

Every bill which brings forth the poor pretense of a debate is predestined and its fate determined by the steering committee, into whose hands the Republican majority of the House have abdicated our powers and functions.

When Oliver Cromwell cleared out the Parliament House with a file of soldiers it was no whit more tyrannical, no whit more subversive of the fundamental principles of representative government, than an assumption upon the part of the steering committee of a power which should only be exercised by a majority of the House, namely, the power to legislate.

This spirit of usurpation has spread to the committees of the House. The majority members of the Foreign Affairs Committee displayed it in a most reactionary way in drafting and bringing before the House the so-called peace resolution. Star chamber meetings of the majority Members were called, and without giving hearings to any of the many citizens of this country who were interested in the questions involved in the proposed legislation and without letting the minority members of the committee know what was in progress, prepared the substance and the style of the resolution, including the punctuation, and only invited the minority in after all this was completed. Then the minority had the privilege of sitting by and seeing the resolution reported out just as it came from the star chamber meeting. As far as I know, this is the first time an important question bearing upon our foreign relations has been made a party question by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Knox resolution, which was better in many particulars and worse in others than the Porter resolution—assuming that there was any value in either of them—was totally rejected and the good and bad features of it were all thrown out.

The worst feature of the Knox resolution was that part of it which repealed our resolutions declaring that a state of war existed with the Governments of Germany and Austria-Hungary.

The majority report of the Foreign Affairs Committee says that such a repeal might raise the inference that we have disavowed or repudiated the war; that it might be construed as an apology to Germany for our participation in the war. If the majority had expressed their true feeling they would have made this statement much stronger. They would have said that that part of the Knox resolution did disavow and repudiate the war and that it was an apology to Germany for our participation therein. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the majority had given expression to their real views, they would have denounced every Republican Senator who voted for the Knox resolution when it passed the Senate on April 29 as having voted to repudiate the war and to apologize to Germany for our participation in it, and what they did say comes very near doing this.

I do not know how the Republicans of the Senate feel about this denunciation on the part of the majority members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, which will on next Monday be indorsed by the House; but I believe that the great majority of the American people feel that it is a just and deserved rebuke of the Senators who voted for the Knox resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I also feel that it is a just and well-deserved rebuke administered by the Foreign Affairs Committee to members of that committee and most of the Republican membership of this House in the Sixty-sixth Congress who voted on May 21, 1920, and on May 28, 1920, for a resolution in the exact words of that part of the Knox resolution repealing our resolutions declaring that a state of war existed with the Governments of the enemy countries.

The only reason the Senate Republicans are more entitled to rebuke than the House Republicans is that in the Senate they voted for this repealing resolution three times and in the House up to this time they have only voted for it twice.

This is only a difference in degree, for a vote once to repudiate the war and apologize to Germany for our participation in it leaves a blot upon the records of the party or person so voting that can never be erased. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The only results it has been claimed that this resolution would accomplish are, first, that it will restore peace; and second, that it will help our trade with Germany. A great many gentlemen will vote for this resolution because they say that the people want peace. The people do want peace, and I suppose every Member of this House wants peaceful relations restored between this country and Germany and Austria-Hungary, but this resolution is not needed to restore peace, because we are already at actual peace with these countries, and we have been for nearly three years.

It will restore a status of peace, so far as we are concerned, which does not now exist, and which should not exist until the questions in dispute between this country and the enemy countries arising out of the war are settled by negotiation or agreements imposed upon them by us.

As for advancing our trade with Germany, that is going forward as rapidly as German financial conditions and credit will permit and has been increasing ever since the embargo was lifted in 1919. This year—that is, the year ending June 30, 1921—our export trade with Germany will be larger than it ever has been in the history of our trade relations with that country—about $400,000,000, as against $352,000,000 in 1913, the previous high-water mark of that trade.

It is said that our trade would be larger if Germany had more credit in this country. This is a misleading statement. She has to-day just as much credit as she would have if the technical status of war between her and this country did not exist.

The Porter resolution can not possibly do any good, and it may do much harm. It will not benefit a single American citizen, institution, or interest, and will place this country at a decided disadvantage in settling the issues growing out of the war with the countries against which we contended. What is more, it will sacrifice the interests of thousands of our citizens and cost this country and its nationals millions of dollars. It will ruin many of the people who bought the enemy alien property in this country, which was sold under authority of an act of Congress. It may cause us to lose title to the German patents which we seized during the war. There are a great number of losses that it may cause to America and her nationals.

That it is not needed for the purposes of peace or commerce was shown in the speech made by President Harding when he was a Senator, a little more than a year ago, on May 15, 1920, in which he said:

> I do not regard a pronouncement of formal peace as tremendously essential to the welfare of the United States or to the promotion of our trade relationships with the other nations of the world. I do not think a formal declaration of peace is essential to continued freedom from hostilities; I do not think it possible that Germany is likely to resume armed warfare against this Republic in two generations to come; nor does it seem to me necessary to have this formal declaration, particularly in this form, in order to resume our commercial relations with Germany, for they are already more or less resumed, and, in the very nature of things, trade relations with Germany will be developed according to the needs of that people and our own inclination to trade. * * *
> So the peace resolution is not seriously involved in a continuation of peaceful relationships.
> I think the significance of the passage of this resolution lies in its reestablishment of the constitutional powers of the American Congress. It not only reestablishes the powers of Congress, but it particularly emphasizes the powers of the Senate as a coordinate body in the making of treaties. I like to think that the so-called Knox resolution is going to do for America what the World War did for the autocrat of Germany. The World War demonstrated that no one man and no one power can rule the world, and the Knox resolution is going to be a formal demonstration that no one man can run the United States of America.

These were the President's views a year ago. They could hardly have changed, or he would not have permitted the House to wait two months after it had assembled before taking this matter up. He would not have allowed these distinguished gentlemen who are members of the Foreign Affairs Committee to dawdle away a month and a half after the resolution had passed the Senate before reporting it to the House.

The only conclusion we can reach from the action of the President and the Republican leaders in this House is that the President entertains the same views to-day that he did when he delivered his speech a year ago, that in his opinion this resolution is not needed for peace with the enemy countries or for the purpose of increasing our trade with Germany.

The speech of the President is a full and complete answer to every argument made for this resolution.

There is, then, no argument that can be made for this resolution except that it keeps an unwise campaign promise made by the President when a candidate that he would sign a declaration of peace as soon as a Republican Congress could pass it and a Republican President could sign it. He made that promise, and now, three months after his inauguration, the Republicans would put through this resolution in order that the promise may be kept.

The only other purpose it can serve is an attempt to fool the American people into the belief that the Republican majority in Congress is doing something for peace and something to improve the distressed financial and business conditions of this country. But you can not fool the people long. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This rule should not be adopted. I hope every Democrat in this House will vote against this rule. The Democrats went down in defeat last November, but they upheld the honor and integrity of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They kept the faith, and they face the future with undimmed courage and a supreme confidence in the verdict of history. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina use the remainder of his time?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

UMI

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I shall confine my remarks solely to the adoption of the rule, and if I get time I shall speak on the peace resolution itself.

The Republican majority in the House is suffering from obesity. [Laughter.] The elephant is afflicted with elephantiasis. [Laughter.] There is no reason and no justification for this rule. You allow two days of general debate, and then you prohibit amendments, suggestions, changes, which debates usually are conducted for. What will you do during these two days of general debate, when no suggestion can be made that can be adopted under the rule, when no amendment can be offered that can be incorporated under the rule? It will be a strange debate on a peace resolution, which, in the very nature of things, is of the gravest international importance.

This resolution will of necessity partake of the character of a treaty.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not strange that no amendment can be offered to this resolution, and yet the Republican Party themselves have offered three different resolutions, peace resolutions, of different kinds?

Mr. LONDON. Yes. That is what I was coming to. The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House must credit the Senate with some intelligence. Yet they repudiate the resolution adopted by the Senate, and while they have the courage to repudiate the resolution adopted by the Senate, they say to the House, "The resolution which we have now suggested to you is so wise, so incontrovertible, and so invulnerable that no suggestion dare be made by any Member of the House." [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The first resolution was the Porter resolution of last year. The Senate changed that. Now the Senate adopts a resolution different from that, and the House refuses to adopt that, and the present resolution is not the same as any of the other three.

Mr. LONDON. Of course, the majority has its rights, and the theory prevails that anything that a majority does represents the voice of the people. But majorities must be tolerant. There must be some opportunity given to the representatives of the millions of people who are in the minority.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. As a matter of frankness and fairness in the premises, does not the gentleman know that this rule is identical, practically, with those presented in the last two years by the Democratic side of the House?

Mr. LONDON. If I am not frank, who will be? Of course you are paying the Democrats back in their own coin. I remember the McLemore resolution. I remember when the Members of this House were asked to stultify themselves. I was one of those that refused to do so. And I now refuse to go through the same silly performance under the Republican régime. Why should you? You have tremendous power now, and with power should come responsibility, and with responsibility should come the exercise of tolerance, discretion, and indulgence of opportunity to the minority.

Mr. BRITTEN. Just at that point will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not this rule apply responsibility to this side of the House, and is not that what this side of the House desires?

Mr. LONDON. The Republican side of the House prevents the adoption of any suggestions or amendments to a peace resolution, the most important step that Congress has taken since the Civil War. Do not make any mistake about it. Any fool can enter war. It is hard to make peace. It is hard to lay the foundations for peace. Why should not the Members on the floor of the House be allowed to suggest either the adoption of the Versailles treaty or amendments to the Versailles treaty, or amendments providing for the scrapping of the Versailles treaty and for an association of nations?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman can do just that thing on this resolution.

Mr. LONDON. But it can not be adopted.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is up to the House.

Mr. LONDON. No; under the rule you prevent the adoption of any amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. You can embody that in a motion to recommit. You can put the whole Versailles treaty in a motion to recommit.

Mr. LONDON. No; the motion to recommit means only one motion. The gentleman should not try to confuse the House. He knows that the motion to recommit means only one motion by one Member. That means that only one Member of the House can make a suggestion for a change.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And no debate will be permitted on the motion to recommit.

Mr. LONDON. That is so. No debate can be had on the motion to recommit. To give two days for general debate and to deny the right to amend or change is certainly a denial of every principle of fair discussion. The individual Member of the House feels that he counts for nothing, that he is a mere tool, a mere cog in the wheel; that the machine, the majority, in this case the committee, tell him what to do, tell him how to vote, and put him in an absurd position. The entire procedure is indefensible, particularly in view of the fact that you have an overwhelming majority that can always assert its will.

The rule should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY].

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Speaker, it is most improbable that anything I can say will change the proposed intention of the majority to pass this resolution, yet I feel that my protest should be entered of record to this method of ending the war with Germany.

I realize that the Government of this country is a government by parties, but there are many things affecting vitally our whole country that should not be the plaything of politics. This is one of them. Yet we find a rule brought in by the majority which contemplates deciding the foreign policy of this country in less time than the House takes to decide whether there shall be one hospital or fifty for wounded soldiers, and far less time than is given to whether our citizens shall drink water or wine. Why, I ask my Republican friends, this unseemly haste on such an important matter? But the issue has been presented in this resolution and it is a vain thing to kick against the Republican majority. There was another resolution sent over to the House from the other branch of this great assembly. What has become of that, I ask my Republican friends? I am new to these proceedings but the information I seek is not forthcoming. The Senate resolution repealed the declaration of war; this resolution declares that the war is terminated. Frankly, I would not have voted for a resolution to repeal the declaration of war, but it seems to me that it was a much more logical proceeding than this one. But why should either resolution have been introduced when our Constitution provides an orderly proceeding, and one that would safeguard our rights without any question? I know there seems to be some dissatisfaction with our Constitution, but it is the anchor provided by the founders of this Government to prevent the ship they were launching from being carried away from its moorings when the weather changed, and no party in this country can afford to recognize it as merely a "scrap of paper."

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution says that Congress shall have power "to declare war," and Article II, section 2, recites that "the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy," and shall have power, by and with the consent of the Senate, "to make treaties." This surely includes the power to conclude a treaty of peace. The President of these United States should follow the method laid down in the Constitution and enter into negotiations with the German Government toward concluding a treaty of peace, thus determining finally the war status.

It has been contended by some, however, that the power to declare war carries with it the power to declare peace, and that Congress has the implied right. This is not so. A brief study of the authorities would convince you that there is no such implication. Chief Justice Marshall, in Brown against United States, says that "the power to declare war, in my opinion, includes all the powers incident to war and necessary to carry it into effect." He is followed by Justices Story, Swayne, and Bradley, and in the cases I have read not one of them mentions any such implied power. It was so absolutely apparent that the founders of the Government considered the Commander in Chief the proper authority to initiate a peace status and provide for the final treaty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, that it never crossed the minds of any of these great lawyers that any other thing might be contemplated. This is the first time in the history of the Nation, so far as I know, that such action has ever been considered. Why consider it when there is a safe, orderly, usual proceeding already followed in other cases that will serve as a precedent and will preserve our rights?

But take for granted that Congress has the authority to declare peace. Does a mere declaration of peace on the part of one combatant constitute peace? We know it does not. In the case of individuals, one party may cry "peace, peace" and yet there be no peace. There must be an agreement to constitute a state of peace, and a mere declaration by one party that he is at peace is useless without the consent of the opponent. Such a declaration is futile and useless. Why, then, in the name of heaven do our Republican friends want to pass such a piece of legislation?

There are certain reasons intimated for it being done in this way. I would not for one moment assail the patriotism of a single Member on this floor. I believe that all of us are sincerely trying to get at what is best for the country, but the issue is too great, the policy established by this precedent too momentous, to let a shrinking from what may be construed as a criticism of my colleagues cause a glossing over of these reasons.

I believe it is a mistake to let anything influence our decision in this matter except the purely abstract question of what should be our foreign policy.

Some believe that this resolution should pass without delay in order that our commerce with Germany should be reestablished. It is contended by them that the prosperity of our country depends in large measure in getting the relations of commerce renewed. I know that this country is in financial stress. I know there is a lack of prosperity, but I can not believe that the prosperity of America is dependent upon Germany. God save us if our future prosperity is tied up with German commerce. As far as I am concerned, and I believe I speak for the people I represent, I would rather, far rather, never ship her another piece of merchandise than have Germany escape the consequences of her wrongdoing. If the United States can not have prosperity without Germany, then let us remain in poverty.

But even this reason—mistaken theory that it is—falls to the ground when we examine the exports. We have already been informed from reliable sources that it does not need this declaration to establish commercial relations, for already we are dealing with Germany to a very large extent, just as large an extent, in fact, as she can take care of.

It has been also intimated that the passage of this resolution would be acceptable to those of German descent, who, though living in America, look back with longing to their fatherland and desire her peace status restored. I am not attributing any immoral or unpatriotic motives to these citizens, but I do say such citizens should recognize that Germany has forfeited her rights to be treated with sympathy, and they should be the last ones to try to secure any sympathy for her. If they are truly Americanized, then they must recognize that Germany is being punished for her sins, and we have not yet heard that Germany even went through a deathbed repentance. Much less should any political capital be made out of this in any way. It lies too near the heart of the Nation for political experiments to be tried with it.

But there is a most important reason why this resolution should not pass. That is the unfavorable position it would place us in in reference to reparations and indemnities. Two results flow at once from this declaration. The first is our troops must be withdrawn; it is inconceivable that we keep our troops on the soil of a country with whom we are at peace. If we do withdraw our troops, then we are no longer supporting our allies, and it would deal a heavy blow to our present favorable position with them. Is it conceivable that those boys who fought the Hun at Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry, shoulder to shoulder with the boys of England and France, will support a resolution that carries such consequence with it?

And what assurance have we that Germany will not come to the conclusion, should we make peace, that she can whip poor, bleeding France? We know her arrogance of old. Your proposed action, my friends, instead of tending to the peace of the world, may be simply a reopening of the old quarrel.

Then there is another reason why the resolution should not pass. It opens up the question of what Germany should pay as indemnity for her acts. There is no precedent for this. Why could not Germany say, "We are at peace. You said so yourself without waiting to find out what I was willing to pay you for the damage I did. Now I will not pay you anything." There is no court in which to collect her debt to us. We could do nothing except make a show of force, and that is out of all question, of course. Do you believe she would do it? I do, and you do, too. Before that crazy lad drew back his arm and hurled a bomb at a strutting prince of Europe at Sarayevo I thought and the world thought in the highest terms of German culture and civilization. You did not believe, nor did I, that she would have sunk the Lusitania. But she did; and not one regret has passed her lips nor one tear at the suffering of those women and children drowning in the icy waters of the Atlantic. I distrust her, or, rather, I know now that she will take any advantage she can, regardless of its morality or its justice. Grotius says that "after a peace no action lies for damages done in the war." I am no authority on international law, but the man in the backwoods knows that Germany will not pay unless she is made to settle her obligations.

Far be it from us to follow the bad example set us by Germany and sing a hymn of hate, but demanding justice is not the German attitude. Germany insulted our flag, she sunk our ships, she murdered our innocent women and children, and she violated all the laws of God and man, and I do not want to see her go unwhipped of justice. I for one am not willing to take the chance of Germany's escape from her obligations, as I fear will be the result of the passage of this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, on the morning of Good Friday, 1917, after a series of outrages on the part of Germany, this Congress, by resolution, declared that a state of war had been thrust upon America. The day was the anniversary of supreme sacrifice in the world's history. It seemed fitting that America should offer herself upon the altar of liberty upon that day.

Before proceeding with the discussion of the resolution presented by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I shall say a word with respect to this rule. I wish to say that, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] intended to intimate that the minority was not opposed to it, he certainly misunderstood our attitude. We were having a hearing on another matter.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman is under a misapprehension. I did not mean to intimate that the Democratic Members favored the rule.

Mr. POU. I understood from the gentleman from Ohio that he made the point that there was practically no opposition to the rule.

Mr. FESS. My point was that the question of not opening it to amendment had not been mentioned.

Mr. POU. Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker, everybody present knew that it was not worth while to attempt to do so, because we were notified that this was the thing that was going to be put through. What is the use of indulging in any child's play? I know the gentleman from Ohio wants to be fair and I want to be fair, and he will not rise in his place now and deny that the understanding at that meeting of the Rules Committee was that this rule was to be reported just as it is. What is the use to quibble about it? They sent for us, we were notified that this was the thing that was going to be done, and it was done; and when you did it you reported a resolution not worthy the spirit of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, stop and think of it. Here is this House of Representatives establishing a so-called status of peace with Germany in the old-fashioned, discredited, hog-tied manner of putting things through without giving to the House opportunity to amend. I would drop dead in my tracks before I would vote for such a proposition as this, and I believe there are men on that side who in their heart of hearts are utterly opposed to such procedure. It thoroughly misrepresents the attitude of America in this great World War.

More than this, the majority has indicated that they feel that there is something wrong about it. If you were so sure that this was the thing to do, why under heaven did you not do it on the first day you got here? No; you are not sure of yourself; you have been feeling your way along.

Why wait three months to do a thing which you say everybody in America demands? I do not know how it is with other gentlemen, but so far as I am concerned I pledge you my word that I have not had one single line from any source asking me to vote for such a resolution as this rule puts before the House. Talk about the people wanting it. If the people had been clamoring for peace—such a peace as this—you would have heard of meetings all over the country; you would have had resolutions adopted, and you would have had a nation-wide demand on Congress for instant action, but there has been nothing of the kind. Everybody feels there is something fishy about this thing, and there is. It brings us down from the high and noble position we occupied with our associates in the war and lines us up with Germany. That is what it does. The Kaiser in all probability would have written just such a resolution as this. Mr. Bergdoll will probably hail the passage of this resolution with supreme delight. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The heart of every slacker and German sympathizer throughout the war will beat with exultation when you do this thing. Every traitor to the flag will feel that you have vindicated his stand.

My God, men! In the supreme days of the war, yes, even when the armistice was declared, you could not find a man under the American flag who would dare to come out and admit that he would stand for such a peace as is here proposed. I do not believe the Speaker was for it, I do not believe Dr. FESS was for it, I do not believe PHIL. CAMPBELL was for it. Then, why are you doing it? You might as well call a spade a spade; you are playing politics, that is all. It may be that you will nail down the German vote; I do not know, you may not. Thank God you will not nail down the American vote by making a peace with Germany for which apology may be necessary. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Just why that genial, kindly, gentleman who occupies the presidential chair wanted to make such a promise during his campaign I do not know. I do not understand that he agreed to ratify any such a resolution as this. However, there is one thing in this business that does fill me with pride. I thank God that we had one man on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I think I know who he is, who had the courage to say that the repeal of the resolution declaring war might be construed as an apology for the action we took on that memorable Good Friday.

I thank you, Mr. PORTER, for that expression in your minority report. It is worthy of you and your Americanism, and your constituents ought to be proud of you; but this thing that you substitute is a confounded little better, but [laughter and applause on the Democratic side] let me beg you never to agree to the Senate resolution. We ought to turn away from both. Why is it that the President of the United States, if he wanted to make peace with Germany, couldn't do it in the regular way? If we felt that we ought to break away from the position we occupied with our allies, a position maintained all during the war, a position for which many of our boys sacrificed their young lives—if we wanted to do that, why did not the President send a peace commission to Germany and invite Germany to get together and write a treaty and take care of the American interests before the treaty was sent to the Senate to be ratified?

Instead of that you put the cart before the horse. You have done the assinine thing of making peace, and then saying that all American rights shall be thereafter safeguarded and protected. Will they? I do not know, and you do not know. Suppose Germany says no; what are you going to do about it; are you going to fight? That is your only remedy. Remember this, Germany has never complied with any demand of the Allies until she felt she must do so. I do not believe that anybody will stand up and say seriously that these reservations and stipulations are worth the paper on which they are written. I am not much of a lawyer, but such a lawyer as I am I will stake my reputation that they are not worth the paper on which they are written. But if you were determined to make a separate peace, why in the world did not you provide in your resolution that peace should not be effective until Germany had agreed to all these things? Why make peace and then say that we reserve all these things? I reserve the right to call on you, Mr. Speaker, for $10,000, and there is just as much sense in declaring such a reservation as that as there is in the reservations set forth in your so-called peace resolution.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The first Porter resolution provided that if Germany did not agree to all these things an embargo should exist.

Mr. POU. The gentleman is right, and why in the world the majorty of the Foreign Affairs Committee wanted to tie America hand and foot and place her in the power of Germany is a thing I can not understand.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In the event that this resolution should pass, and it is likely that it will, declaring a state of peace with Germany, suppose the present Government of Germany should refuse to negotiate any additional treaty with the United States, what attitude would that put our Government in?

Mr. POU. I will say to my friend I would not venture to answer that question in the short space that I have allotted to me. I simply say this, that when we pass this resolution and it is ratified by the President, you open Pandora's box for all manner of trouble. What the law would be under the conditions stated I would not undertake to say. No man ought to undertake to say what it would be except after much serious study and investigation; but I do know this, the only party bound by this resolution is the land of the Stars and Stripes, which was victor in the war. I know you bind us, but you do not bind Germany, and any man who would have proposed such a peace as this immediately after the armistice was signed would have been laughed at. That would have been the mildest sort of treatment he would have received, and he might have received something much worse.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit this proposition: This House has no power in the premises. Making peace and declaring war are utterly different. The House of Representatives has no jurisdiction to make peace. It must concur in declaring war. If President Harding had appointed his peace commissioner and had negotiated a treaty with Germany, the Senate would have ratified it and it would have been law. The House would not have been asked to agree. Peace in this instance is a fact. It came by the cessation of war. It does not come by legislative enactment. War can come in that way, but you do not bring peace in that way. Actual peace came with the signing of the armistice. You now propose to resolve that war with Germany has ended. It has ended. Everybody knows it, and you are not fooling anybody about it. Everyone knows that this is the end of the march downward from that high, noble position attained by America under the masterful leadership of Woodrow Wilson in the great fight for the liberty and freedom of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is unworthy of the Americanism of any Member of this House. I have been here too long to impugn any man's motives, and I shall not do so now. I simply say, speaking from the heart, that I can not understand how any man who loves his country, who is devoted to its flag, who believes in the righteousness and justice of the war, can lend his assent to such an unworthy piece of business as this. I can not rid myself of a feeling of mortification. Such action as you propose does not truly represent the spirit of America.

Mr. Speaker, I can do no more than protest. I can not hope to stay the hand of those in power. There is a band of Members, even though it may be small in number, which would stay your hand if they could. For myself I could not be content if the record of this hour did not contain my protest. I protest in the name of the splendid people whom I represent—a district which had no slackers, no traitors, whose every home, from the cabin to the most palatial home, was loyal, patriotic, and true all during the war. In the name of that district I protest against the action you are about to take, in the name of the living I protest, and, Mr. Speaker, in the name of some of the dead, whose sentiments I knew, I protest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I was very deeply impressed with the last statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]. The war, so far as one near and dear to him is concerned, was ended in noble heroism on the field that is the final arbiter. The gentleman from North Carolina has, therefore, unusual personal right to protest, but so far as his protests affect the people of his district I doubt very much if they are concerned about the phraseology of this resolution. The purpose of the resolution is to declare what the fact is, to let the formality agree with the reality, to let it be formally declared to the world that the war between Germany and the United States and Austria-Hungary and the United States is at an end, so that we may resume diplomatic relations with both countries and send our consular representatives to them. That is the purpose of this resolution.

Before discussing that phase of the matter further, I want to give some attention to the eloquent and interesting speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. It is always a delight to listen to the euphonious sentences and the perfectly vibrant voice of the eloquent, the magnetic gentleman from New York. He can be eloquent upon any subject. He can be forceful upon any phase of any subject. Whether for it or against it, whether upon one side or the other, he can make himself most interesting. He took occasion this morning to speak of the decadence of the House of Representatives and took as his cue the resignation of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. He then turned to this side of the House and made an especial appeal to the new Members, stating that the reason for Mr. GOOD's resignation was because of a succession of rules similar to the one that the House was about to vote upon. He asked the Members to recall the names of the great men who have been the products of this House in the past, and he named Clay and Blaine and Reed. Then there was applause. He would lead us to believe that in the palmy days of the House of Representatives there were no limitations upon the rights of Members, and that it was then producing Blaines and Clays and Reeds because of the freedom that they had. He proceeded then to call attention to the men who had quit profitable business to come here in those palmy days and enumerated them. I wonder if it was only inadvertence that made him fail to tell you that Tom Reed did exactly the same thing that JIM GOOD has done—resigned from the House of Representatives in order to practice law, so that he could make a little money for his family, to leave them something after he had gone. Men have been doing the same thing in the House of Representatives from the days of Henry Clay down to the present time. Men develop here because of their capacity for work, because of their ability, or because of their industry and ambition, and the same opportunities that were open to those noted names in the past are open to gentlemen here to-day and will be open to men in this House in future years.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] would lead you to believe that we are doing a most outrageous and unusual thing in presenting a rule which provides for the consideration of a solemn question in a formal way. This matter deals with a diplomatic question, and we must use diplomatic language. It is provided, therefore, that the House should have an opportunity to vote on that question without amendment. This is the cause of the gentleman's criticism. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from New York to this fact: The gentleman from New York may embody every amendment that may be germane to this resolution in a well-prepared motion to recommit the resolution and get a vote upon it, so he is denied nothing which is germane to the resolution. The rule which provided for the declaration of war was a solemn rule couched in the same language. It did not offer opportunity for amendment, sane or otherwise, embarrassing or otherwise. That was not a moment for frivolity, it was not a time for the consideration of partisan or political questions, so that a dignified resolution declaring the existence of a state of war was voted upon under a rule, without amendment. We have approached the time for a declaration of a state of peace between the United States and Germany. That declaration should be made with the same solemnity and with the same dignity as the declaration of war.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman will permit, I was going to recall to the gentleman from Kansas the fact that the so-called McLemore resolution, which excited so much interest, was brought in and put through the House under the same conditions and no one had an opportunity to offer any amendment whatever.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is true. That has been done on resolutions of this kind and on matters of this kind for many years. Throughout the history of the Congress it has been the custom to consider matters in such a way as to lend the greatest dignity to their consideration. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] was disturbed because in the other body a resolution was passed repealing the declaration of war with Germany. I wonder if my friend from North Carolina knew that there were propagandists from his side of the House circulating around here on this side of the House saying, "Why, if you vote for the rule you can not have an opportunity to vote for the Knox resolution."

Mr. FLOOD. Who are the propagandists?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, they have been around here and they have made these suggestions to many on this side of the House.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman ought to name them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Virginia refers to the Knox resolution as one of the crimes of the century. The gentleman from North Carolina is a little less forceful in his criticism, and yet gentlemen over here are told that if they vote for this rule they will not have an opportunity to vote for the Knox resolution. I agree with the Committee on Foreign Affairs that it is far more dignified and far more compatible with the conditions that now exist to declare that the war between the United States and Germany is at an end than to pass a resolution repealing the declaration declaring the existence of a state of war. Further, the gentleman from North Carolina places great emphasis upon the fact that this would do nothing, that it would accomplish nothing, that it was a vain thing, that peace already existed. Well, hostilities have ended, but the formal declaration that the war is at an end has not been made. The gentleman says that should be done by the President of the United States through a commission. He says that immediately following the armistice that no man here would have dared to make such a suggestion as is made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs at this time. I think that is true. There was no occasion for it then. Up to that time there had been no failure on the part of the Executive to negotiate a proper treaty of peace. There has been a dismal, humiliating failure upon the part of the Executive to negotiate a treaty of peace and so declared by a majority of 7,000,000 of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.] Time has brought about many conditions that make this resolution desirable at this time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What about the failure since the people spoke last November; what about the failure for the last two months; the last three months? Has that been a humiliating and dismal failure? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; I would not think so. We have been pretty busy here, as the gentleman from Tennessee will testify, I think.

Mr. FLOOD. Busy doing nothing.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not think that the country will say that we have been doing nothing. We have been doing a great deal. We have been cleaning up the most scandalously wasteful mess that has ever been left to this Republican Party by any Democratic administration, and they always leave things in a mess. [Applause on the Republican side.] We have been endeavoring to bring some sort of order out of a chaotic condition that was unparalleled.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the gentleman give any assurance that it is the purpose or the intention of the Executive to begin negotiations with Germany for a treaty immediately or soon after the passage of this resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The present Executive will do his full duty in that respect, I am sure, as soon as this resolution is passed. I have no authority to speak for him; I have no letter in my pocket from him on the subject. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If this resolution means what gentlemen upon that side say it means, what is there for the Executive to do after it passes?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I suppose, agree to a commercial treaty with Germany and Austria. But the gentleman knows that the treaty of Versailles gave us nothing. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield again, then why are you reserving rights under the treaty of Versailles? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, I do not think we are reserving very much. I do not think that the reservations hurt the revolving part of the resolution.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that while we are technically at war we are actually at peace without any of the fruits of peace, while Europe is taking advantage of peace and while being technically at peace is actually at war?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I was just approaching that phase of the question. Our allies in the war have had their diplomatic and consular representatives in Germany and in Austria for two years now. The only reason we have no representatives there is because we have not formally declared the fact that a state of war no longer exists.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question purely for information?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If I can give it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman contend that the passage of this resolution will result in an exchange of ambassadors between Germany and the United States?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Just as soon as peace has been declared formally, then the question of sending ambassadors will be taken up by the Executives of the two countries, in my judgment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it not a fact that the reason the United States has stood aloof since the treaty of Versailles was agreed upon, while the Governments of Europe have been allowed to go ahead under the treaty of Versailles, was because our own Executive agreed that that treaty should go into effect without our consent?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; that is true. Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been the usual criticism made of this resolution. It is the office of the minority to find fault with what the majority is doing. It is the office of the minority to make inroads upon the majority if they can, and with my aid and assistance this morning the minority put their largest gun into action. And I submit to you that after the thunders of his oratory are over and you make an examination of the havoc he created, you will find it was not so serious after all. He talked well, as usual. I would be glad to hear him again to-morrow. I am delighted that he is in the House of Representatives. He adds very much to the gaiety of the House as well as to that of the Nation every time he speaks. But when he says that the House of Representatives is in a decadent condition he overlooks the present growth of the House of Representatives to a condition of virility and power. The House of Representatives was never more representative of the people of the country than it is to-day. It never was more dignified and it never was more virile or more powerful; it never was more assertive of its rights, and they are being accorded by the other end of the Capitol as well as by the other end of the Avenue, and the country is glad.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a matter of fact the Democratic members in the Committee on Rules voted unanimously against reporting this rule to the House of Representatives, and I sincerely hope and believe that those who have read the minority report of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will vote against the adoption of the rule. It is a great thing, however, for the country and for the Congress that this rule was reported to the House, because it served as a basis for one of the greatest speeches that has been delivered in this House in a decade, the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I was amazed when he took his seat to see the absolute unanimity with which the Republican side of the House applauded his statements, which means, of course, that whereas they demonstrated by their applause that they indorse and agree with everything that the gentleman from New York said, yet, as a matter of political expediency, I take it for granted that they will vote for the rule when it is put upon its passage.

Now, gentlemen, I have carefully read the two reports—the majority and the minority reports—that have come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The minority report goes into detail and points out one strong argument after another why this House should vote against the adoption of this rule and the resolution. I defy gentlemen on that side of the House to point out a single argument that is presented in the majority report asking for the passage of this resolution through the House. My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the chairman of the Republican congressional committee, laid great stress on the fact that the country last year by an unprecedented majority voted the Democratic Party out of power. Of course, that is true; but I say to the gentleman from Ohio, and I believe I speak the truth, that half of the votes that the Republican Party got last year they got under false pretenses, when Secretary Hughes, Secretary Hoover, and ex-President Taft stood sponsor to the American people to the effect that the only way to get a league of nations was by the election of President Harding. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Those distinguished gentlemen, one of whom I hope will soon have a place as Chief Justice of the United States, a place for which he is eminently fitted, stood sponsor for the League of Nations; and that is why, with those false pretenses held up before the American people, you got the majority that you did. But I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that even with that defeat last fall it was not as bad as in 1912, when your party carried only the two little States of Vermont and Utah. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I believe, speaking my own sentiments and speaking for those people who believe in the League of Nations, I want to see my party stand now and for years to come, until we take our rightful place, for the League of Nations; and I believe that in due time this great American Republic will take its proper place among the civilized nations of the earth as a member of such League of Nations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Ah, gentlemen, I have your Republican platform here, by which you are supposed to be guided. That platform says that you are for making and preserving peace by an association of nations. It does not say that you are for making peace and preserving peace by a resolution of Congress. You are pledged to an association of nations, and that is what you promised the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is this on the passage?

The SPEAKER. On the passage.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members. Those in favor of agreeing to the resolution will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 212, nays 105, answered "present" 1, not voting 113, as follows:

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, did not vote. I have a pair with him. I voted "no." I want to change that vote to "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 16) repealing the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the United States and Germany, and the joint resolution of December 7, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the United States and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, and for other purposes.

Resolved, etc., That the joint resolution of Congress passed April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the Imperial German Government and the Government and people of the United States of America, and making provisions to prosecute the same, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and said state of war is hereby declared at an end.

That all property of the Imperial German Government or its successor or successors, and of all German nationals which was, on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of the Government of the United States of America or of any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States of America and no disposition thereof made, except as shall have been heretofore or specifically hereafter shall be provided by Congress, until such time as the German Government has, by treaty with the United States of America, ratification whereof is to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, made suitable provisions for the satisfaction of all claims against the German Government of all persons, wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States of America and who have suffered, through the acts of German Government or its agents since July 31, 1914, loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property, directly or indirectly, whether through the ownership of shares of stock in German, American, or other corporations, or in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war, or otherwise, and also provisions granting to persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States of America most favored nation treatment, whether the same be national or otherwise, in all matters affecting residence, business, profession, trade, navigation, commerce, and industrial property rights, and confirming to the United States of America all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States of America during the war, whether in respect to the property of the German Government or German nationals, and waiving any and all pecuniary claims based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of such treaty, any existing treaty between the United States of America and Germany to the contrary notwithstanding.

That until by treaty or act or joint resolution of Congress it shall be determined otherwise, the United States of America, although it has not ratified the treaty of Versailles, reserves for itself and its nationals all of the rights, powers, claims, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which it and its nationals are or may become entitled, together with the right to enforce the same, under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof or otherwise, or which under the treaty of Versailles have been stipulated for its benefit, or for the benefit of its nationals, with the same force and effect as if said treaty of Versailles had been ratified by the United States of America, or to which the United States of America is or may become entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers.

That the joint resolution of Congress approved December 7, 1917, declaring that "a state of war exists between the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government and the Government and the people of the United States of America and making provisions to prosecute the same," be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and said state of war is hereby declared at an end.

That all property of the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or its successor or successors, and of all nationals of the Austrian Empire or the Kingdom of Hungary which was, on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under the control of the Government of the United States of America or of any of its officers, agents, or employees from any source or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States of America and no disposition thereof made, except as shall have been heretofore or specifically hereafter shall be provided by Congress, until such time as the Austrian Government has by treaty with the United States of America, ratification whereof is to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, made suitable provisions for the satisfaction of all claims against the Austrian Government of all persons, wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States of America, and who have suffered through the acts of the Austrian Government or its agents since July 31, 1914, loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property, directly or indirectly, whether through the ownership of shares of stock in Austrian, American, or other corporations, or in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war or otherwise, and also provisions granting to persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States of America most favored nation treatment, whether the same be national or otherwise, in all matters affecting residence, business, profession, trade, navigation, commerce, and industrial property rights, and confirming to the United States of America all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States of America during the war, whether in respect to the property of the Austrian Government or nationals of the Austrian Empire, and waiving any and all pecuniary claims based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of such treaty, any existing treaty between the United States of America and Austria to the contrary notwithstanding.

That until by treaty or act or joint resolution of Congress it shall be determined otherwise, the United States of America, although it has not ratified the treaty of Saint Germain or the treaty of Trianon, reserves for itself and its nationals all of the rights, powers, claims, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which it and its nationals are or may become entitled, together with the right to enforce the same under the terms of the armistice signed November 3, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof, or otherwise, or which under the treaty of Saint Germain or the treaty of Trianon have been stipulated for its benefits or for the benefit of its nationals with the same force and effect as if said treaty of Saint Germain and the treaty of Trianon had been ratified by the United States of America, or to which the United States of America is or may become entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers.

With the following House amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States of America by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

SEC. 2. That in making this declaration, and as a part of it, there are expressly reserved to the United States of America and its nationals any and all rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages, together with the right to enforce the same, to which it or they have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof; or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States of America by reason of its participation in the war or to which its nationals have thereby become rightfully entitled; or which, under the treaty of Versailles, have been stipulated for its or their benefit; or to which it is entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers; or to which it is entitled by virtue of an act or acts of Congress; or otherwise.

SEC. 3. That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government and the United States of America by the joint resolution of Congress approved December 7, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

SEC. 4. That in making this declaration, and as a part of it, there are expressly reserved to the United States of America and its nationals any and all rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages, together with the right to enforce the same, to which it or they have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 3, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof; or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States of America by reason of its participation in the war or to which its nationals have thereby become rightfully entitled; or which, under the treaty of Saint Germain-en-Laye or the treaty of Trianon, have been stipulated for its or their benefit; or to which it is entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers; or to which it is entitled by virtue of any act or acts of Congress; or otherwise.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is frequently asserted that by officially declaring the state of war at an end we are abandoning the Allies and our associates in the late war. This is a gross misstatement of fact. All the nations that signed the treaty of Versailles did so with full knowledge that it was not effective, so far as the United States was concerned, until ratified by the Senate; yet notwithstanding this knowledge, unmindful of their rescue by this country from defeat and possible vassalage, and with a total disregard for our rights in case the United States Senate failed to ratify the treaty, they made the following a part of the treaty:

A first procès verbal of the deposit of ratification will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany, on the one hand, and by three of the principal allied and associated powers, on the other hand. From the date of this procès verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it. * * *

Under this provision any three of the principal allied and associated powers could make a separate peace with Germany and leave all the other nations in a state of war. They availed themselves of this privilege. The German National Assembly ratified the treaty on July 10, 1919; Great Britain on July 31, 1919; Italy on October 7, 1919; the Republic of France on October 13, 1919; the Empire of Japan on October 27, 1919; and the procès verbal was promulgated on the 10th of December, 1919. On that date all matters in dispute between Germany, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan were adjusted and settled and a state of peace created among themselves, while the United States, not having ratified the treaty, was allowed to shift for itself. The abandonment, if any, has been of the United States, as we are still at war, while the Allies have been enjoying the advantages of peace since December 10, 1919. If we had made treaties of peace with the Central Powers before the Allies and our associates did, there would be justification of the charge that we had abandoned them, but the undisputed fact is that we are the only nation which engaged in the World War that has not made peace. When the procès verbal was inserted in the treaty it had but one object, and that was to enable the Allies to make a separate peace with the Central Powers, regardless of the action of the United States, and we have had an undoubted right since the promulgation of the procès verbal on the 10th of December, 1919, to make a treaty of peace with our late enemies; but in this, so far, we have been unsuccessful on account of the persistent efforts of the Allies and others to force our Republic into the discredited League of Nations. Assuming that Germany should refuse to concede our extremely modest demands, we could not call upon the Allies to help us to enforce them, as they are at peace with that country, and we would be left to act alone. Fortunately, we are such a great Nation that this situation will not arise; but what would be our condition if we were one of the weaker powers? The Allies deliberately made an agreement under the terms of which they entered into a separate peace, which took effect on December 10, 1919, and, I repeat, that if there has been any abandonment, it has been of the United States by the Allies. It may not be out of place to call attention to the fact that when the peace resolution reached the House the Allies had invaded Germany for the enforcement of the adjustment of the reparations, and action was postponed until Germany had conceded the demands of the Allies and had shown her good faith by payment of the earnest money in the form of the first installment of the indemnity. We have given the Allies the traditional American "square deal" and now intend to put our own house in order. The partisan assertion that we are abandoning our companions in arms in the late war should here end forever.

The Senate resolution repeals the declaration of a state of war, and the debate does not disclose a satisfactory reason why such action was taken. When Congress met on the eventful 6th of April, 1917, it had before it evidence of the sinking of the Lusitania and other vessels, resulting in the murder of hundreds of American citizens. Some of these crimes were condoned under the express promise of Germany that such wanton acts should not occur again. Later she repudiated this solemn agreement and insolently proclaimed that she intended to renew her ruthless and barbarous submarine warfare, thus proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the Imperial German Government was making war upon the people of the United States. Congress had no alternative except to declare a state of war, which Germany had thrust upon us, and to authorize the President to marshal all the resources of the Nation to bring the conflict to a successful termination. The "finding of fact" that a state of war existed is now a matter of history. It is an eternal record of fact beyond the power of Congress to repeal, modify, or limit. The resolution has been executed and its repeal would be as ineffectual and futile as a repeal of the appropriation for the building of the Panama Canal or the Capitol of the Republic. There is no precedent in the history of the Republic for such action; in fact, I doubt if there is a precedent in world history where a victorious nation repealed a declaration of war or a declaration of a state of war. The power to repeal is only exercised as to laws that have a continuing application. It is never used where a law has been executed. Again, the inquiry arises in the mind as to the legal force and effect of repealing the foundation on which all the war legislation rests. How far would it affect rights which have vested by virtue of such legislation? What effect would it have upon the right of the Government to prosecute the people charged with desertion and other offenses against the Government? We are without precedent to guide us and it would be a rash mind, indeed, that would attempt to foresee its results. Moreover, a repeal of the declaration of a state of war would raise an inference that we had disavowed our justification for entering the war, and the annulment of it might be construed as a mild apology for our participation therein. We should do nothing that would cast even a scintilla of doubt on the righteousness and justice of our cause.

The President in his message on April 12, 1921, said:

To establish a state of technical peace without further delay I should approve a declaratory resolution of Congress to that effect with the qualifications essential to protect all our rights. * * * Such a resolution should undertake to do no more than thus declare the state of peace which all America craves.

Obviously, the President did not desire a repeal of the declaration of the state of war, as he expressly limits it to a declaration of a state of peace. Perhaps he felt, as many of us do, that this solemn action of the American Congress should remain on the records of the Republic forever to record the outraged conscience of the American people at the wanton acts of the Imperial German Government. Further, the Senate resolution fixes many terms and conditions of the treaty to be made with our late enemies, thereby unmistakably invading the Executive's prerogative which vests him with the exclusive initiative in the making of treaties, "the President originating and the Senate having a negative" (Jefferson's discussion of treaties under the Constitution). The Senator from Idaho, Mr. BORAH, offers an explanation for these extraordinary provisions by stating that they are only suggestions by the Senate of the terms of the treaty and which the President is free to ignore. We should scrupulously avoid any encroachment upon the prerogatives of the President and exact from him like respect for those of Congress, and thus perpetuate the fundamental principles upon which our Government is founded.

In these circumstances your committee concluded that it was under an imperative duty to submit a substitute for the Senate resolution, and such a substitute is now before you. It declares "the state of technical peace" and "undertakes to do no more." Section 2 reserves all the rights of the United States by reason of our participation in the war, and embodies, in the words of the President, "the qualifications essential to protect all our rights." It does not in the slightest degree infringe upon the treaty-making powers of the President. It is simply a finding of fact that a state of peace exists, and carefully preserves for future adjustment all the rights of the United States. Their status is the same after its passage as before, and the President is as free and unhampered in the making of a treaty as if the resolution had never been passed. The resolution reported by your committee and which was passed by the House in the Sixty-sixth Congress did not repeal the state of war. Like the pending one, it only declared the war at an end.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLOOD. I have not said that the resolution as reported by the gentleman's committee and first voted on in the House contained a repeal of the war resolution. What I say is that the gentleman and most of the Republicans in the Sixty-sixth Congress voted twice for that repeal, which he now so denounces; once when the resolution came back from the Senate after the Knox resolution had been substituted for his resolution, and again when the attempt was made to pass the Knox resolution over the President's veto.

Mr. PORTER. That is not correct. In the closing days of the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress a substitute was passed by the Senate containing a repeal of the declaration of a state of war, and this was vetoed by President Wilson.

The Constitution vests the war powers in Congress in the following language:

To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water; to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States * * *; to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

The President has no war powers. It is true that he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but as such he only carries out the mandate of Congress for the prosecution of the war. Mr. Justice Tawney, in the case of Fleming against Page (50 U. S. Repts., p. 615) states the proposition very clearly. He says:

His duty and his power are purely military. As Commander in Chief he is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military force placed by law at his command and employ them in the manner he may deem most effectual to harass and conquer and subdue the enemy.

Congress can at any time end war by refusing to appropriate money with which to continue it.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. PORTER. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PORTER. All the authorities on international law agree that there are three ways of terminating war between belligerent States, which are as follows:

War may be terminated in three different ways: Belligerents may (1) abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty, or (2) belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty of peace, or (3) a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary. (Oppenheim, International Law, vol. 2, p. 322.)

There are three ways of terminating hostilities between belligerent States, namely, (1) by a mere cessation of hostilities of both sides without any definite understanding supervening; (2) by the conquest and subjugation of one of the contending parties by the other, so that the former is reduced to impotence and submission; (3) by a mutual arrangement embodied in a treaty of peace, whether the honors of war be equal or unequal.

Under the first mode the relationships between the parties remain in a condition of uncertainty, and owing to the numerous difficulties involved, combatant States have very seldom resorted to this method of withdrawing from the war without arriving at some definite and intelligible decision. (Phillipson, p. 3, Termination of War and Treaties of Peace.)

It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, a situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances. (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, July 22, 1868, Dip. Cor., 1868, vol. 2, pp. 32–34, cited Moore's International Law, vol. 7, p. 336.)

These authorities do not leave it open to argument that Congress, which has the power to declare war or a state of war, to raise and support the armies, to provide and maintain a Navy, to provide for calling forth the militia, and so forth, is not vested with the power to declare its duties performed and a state of peace to exist. What are the facts? The armistice was signed on November 11, 1918. Neither of the belligerents has committed a hostile act since that date; on the contrary, the armies have all been demobilized, and all the nations associated with us in the war have formally ended it by treaty. The Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, as such, have ceased to exist. Nowhere in the world is the hand of a German or an Austro-Hungarian raised against a citizen of the United States, nor the hand of a citizen of the United States against a German or an Austro-Hungarian. No reasonable mind can escape the obvious conclusion that the war is long since terminated; therefore it is the right and duty of Congress to declare, as the pending resolution does, that the war is ended. The Constitution does not withhold from Congress the power to declare war at an end, as Congress has the power to repeal or amend any of its legislative acts. Neither does the Constitution require that war declared by Congress must be ended by a treaty negotiated by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, nor does the Constitution provide that a state of peace can not exist except by treaty.

A state of peace is vastly different from a treaty, as peace does not always rest upon the exchange of treaties. The United States is at peace with nations with which it has no treaties, a notable instance of this being Russia, with which we have been at peace throughout our national existence, but with which we have not had a treaty since 1911.

Let us assume that the opponents of this resolution are correct in their contention that there is only one way to make peace, and that is by treaty duly ratified by two-thirds of the Senate, and that through some great misfortune our Republic was in the possession of an invader that was burning our cities and slaughtering our people, and every man, woman, and child was in favor of making peace with the invader. If we can make peace only by treaty, ratified as described, an obdurate and war-mad President could prolong the conflict until legions of our people were destroyed and the country totally devastated. The Constitution did not intend to place any such power in the hands of the President. That foundation of human liberty is entitled to a more reasonable construction. On the contrary, it places upon Congress the duty to preserve the Nation's existence, and the power to make war is one of the ways provided for so doing. Successful warfare makes peace.

During the debate on the peace resolution passed in the Sixty-sixth Congress and which was vetoed by President Wilson it was persistently argued by the opponents of the resolution that it was unconstitutional, and yet, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Wilson had the benefit of these exhaustive and erudite arguments and the advice of the best legal talent in the country, he carefully avoided in his veto message the untenable position that war can only be ended by a treaty of peace. He did not even mention the word "Constitution." The construction of the Constitution by Congress or by the Executive, while not conclusive, has material weight, and his failure to support the contention of his party followers that the resolution was unconstitutional leads to the inescapable conclusion that he discarded their contentions as unsound and unsustainable. The President did not believe that the resolution was unconstitutional, otherwise he would have so declared.

In conclusion, the Constitution vests in Congress all the war powers, among which is the power to declare war and by necessary implication the power to declare a state of peace. A declaration of a state of war and a declaration of a state of peace are "findings of fact." The declaration of a state of war has been executed by bringing the conflict to a successful termination; it therefore becomes the duty of Congress to find this fact officially by declaring a state of peace.

We have demobilized our armies and all other instruments of war; we should now eradicate hate, commercial greed, religious intolerance, and race prejudice, which are the real "four horsemen of the Apocalypse," and thereby perpetuate our race. Let us do our whole duty in binding up the wounds of a war-torn world and dedicate ourselves to the fulfillment of the inspiring utterance of our great President, "It must not be again; it must not be again." [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question before he yields the floor?

Mr. PORTER. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I saw it stated in the public press that the Alien Property Custodian had pointed out certain objections to the Senate provision, saying that as written in that resolution the rights of the United States were, to say the least of it, very doubtful. I think that was the report of it that I saw in the press. I never did see any statement from that official as to why that was, and I am wondering if the committee of the House has attempted to meet those suggestions.

Mr. PORTER. The Alien Property Custodian is entirely satisfied with this resolution. His objections were to the Senate resolution and not to the House resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to ask him——

Mr. PORTER. I have yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I should like to ask if the amendment proposed to this resolution by the Alien Property Custodian was adopted by the majority of the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee?

Mr. PORTER. The gentleman is misinformed. It was merely informally discussed, and we persuaded him that he did not need the amendment and it was not offered.

Mr. FLOOD. Then the amendment that the gentleman suggested was not incorporated in the resolution?

Mr. PORTER. He suggested a very minor amendment, but after discussing it with him I persuaded him that he did not need it and he withdrew it.

Mr. FLOOD. It was an amendment involving $100,000,000 worth of German property.

Mr. PORTER. Oh, no, indeed; it did not.

Mr. FLOOD. That is what he thought.

Mr. PORTER. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of regret that politics should have entered into the consideration of this resolution. When I became a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs 10 years ago politics were unknown in that committee. The majority party, then the Democratic Party, believed that in international matters certainly no political questions ought to arise, and during the whole time that the Democrats were in the majority that committee always consulted with every member who desired to take part in the discussion or consideration of measures before it. I remember very distinctly when the resolution came before that committee in which the arming of merchant vessels was taken up, and the committee considered the matter, the gentleman who is now chairman of this committee [Mr. PORTER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] and all the members desiring to take any part were called in and consulted upon that resolution and the framing of it. In fact, during the whole period of the time when the Democrats were in the majority and throughout the war no politics entered into the deliberations of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

I deplore the fact that since our Republican friends have taken possession every matter that comes up seems to drift into a political question, including this great peace resolution, which should certainly not have any politics contaminating it.

Why, gentlemen, when we were called together to consider this resolution the question was asked by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] and of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] whether or not the majority party had considered this matter in their conference and had decided that no changes would be accepted and no amendments considered. The reply was that they had considered it, but they proposed to vote for the resolution and adopt it as it stood, without any amendment, no matter who might offer them. That was the consideration accorded this resolution in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Now we come to the House, and what do you find here in this forum of the people? Here is a peace resolution favorably reported in which the Knox or Senate resolution is absolutely stricken out and the Porter resolution is adopted in toto by the committee as an amendment and brought into the House, and then a rule is reported from the Rules Committee providing no amendment or change whatever can be made by any Member of the House, Democrat or Republican, to the resolution.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Would the gentleman prefer the Knox resolution?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman does not prefer nor favor either resolution, neither the Porter resolution nor the Knox resolution.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can not yield further. I will say that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], chairman of the committee, says that he did not vote for the Knox resolution or the terms of that resolution he is absolutely in error. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would not yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] on this subject.

Mr. PORTER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made no such statement. He said that the Knox resolution had been voted on twice in the House——

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman said he did not vote for the repeal of the declaration of war as prescribed in the Knox resolution.

Mr. PORTER. The gentleman misunderstood my reply.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from Maryland does not usually misunderstand things. On May 21 the substance of the Knox resolution was offered as an amendment, in which it was said that "the joint resolution of Congress passed April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the Imperial German Government and the Government of the United States, making provision to prosecute the war, is hereby repealed." And on page 4729 the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] is recorded as having voted for it. On May 28 the gentleman is again reported as having voted for it over the President's veto. So much for that.

Now, the gentleman says that he is not in favor of the resolution known as the Knox resolution, that never in the history of this country, or any country, has a declaration of war been repealed. What are the people saying? Here is a resolution drawn by the gentleman who was Secretary of State [Mr. KNOX], who stood high throughout the whole country, and still stands high as a Senator, a Senator of the United States from Pennsylvania—his resolution is passed by the Senate, comes to the House, and is absolutely stricken out in the Committee on Foreign Affairs by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of this committee, and his friends. And then a new resolution is brought in.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman states that the Knox resolution was drawn by Senator KNOX; who drew the substitute for the Knox resolution?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, with all due courtesy to the Senate and the House, I presume that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] drew the resolution. I take it that when a resolution or a bill is introduced in the House or the Senate it is to be presumed that the gentleman who introduces it drew it himself. As I was about to say, when this resolution was passed by the Senate it came over here, was absolutely stricken out and a new resolution substituted in its place. Now, we have an entirely new resolution. I say that if the Republicans of the Senate and the Republicans of the House can not agree on a resolution and have any confidence in it, how can you expect the people of this country to believe in the resolution? [Applause on the Democratic side.] He says that it was obvious that the Constitution intended that Congress should have the right to declare peace because otherwise the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy might devastate the whole country. I say to the gentleman, the Constitution gives Congress the power to appropriate money to carry on the war, and every man knows that Congress controls the purse strings and therefore through that controls all other matters.

In considering this joint resolution by which it is proposed to declare the war between the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government at an end, I can not but be reminded of a cartoon I saw not long ago in one of the papers in which a woman of middle age of goodly proportions and motherly looks was seated in the little home, sewing or knitting. She was marked "Peace." The doorway entering the home, as I remember the cartoon, was marked "Treaty." Emerging from the chimney flue and in the fireplace was a picture of Uncle Sam in a very much dilapidated state. His beard was turned toward his nose, caused by coming down the flue; he was covered with soot and dirt, and as he landed in the fireplace his wife, "Peace," said to him, "Samuel, why did not you come in at the front door?"

I can not but ask the party now in power, having full control of the Senate and House by a large majority, and the Executive, a member of that party, why this great Government of ours should not enter into peaceful relations with the Central Powers of Europe through the front door by a treaty setting forth the respective rights and obligations of each party as was intended by the Fathers and prescribed by the Constitution? If we are to have peace let us have it as befits great nations and belittles none. The United States has never assumed the rôle of dictator, but has rather tempered justice with mercy. Certainly in the hour of her great strength when there is none to challenge her prowess, she should, while attempting to reserve all the rights and privileges accorded her under the Versailles treaty, be willing to enter into a peace treaty, thus avoiding future controversies between the Governments and their nationals, establishing a lasting peace and inviting and encouraging those friendly relations which existed for so many years.

It was never contemplated that Congress should declare peace; in fact, when it was proposed in the constitutional convention as an amendment to follow "declare war," it was defeated. The Constitution specifically provides that the treaty-making power shall be vested in the executive branch of the Government. This method, by resolution of Congress, is so unknown, unusual, and unprecedented that the Republican Senate and House can not even agree among themselves as to the proper language in which to couch the resolution.

We attempt to declare the war at an end. The Senate of the United States has rejected and, to all intents and purposes, firmly repudiated the treaty of Versailles. It was framed by the mighty men of many nations; the brains of the world were concentrated upon this great document which the framers believed would prove one of the greatest instruments, not alone for the settlement of all differences at present, but differences which might arise between nations in the years to come; that it would not alone bring peace to the world but that business and intercourse between nations would again be established upon a sound and substantial basis.

The treaty was rejected, repudiated, and yet by the second section of this resolution Congress attempts to retain all the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which the United States was entitled under that treaty. I have always thought that a treaty was a contract, and that a contract required the meeting of minds upon the subject matter.

Without the ratification of the contract or treaty I can see no rights which the United States can have or reserve thereunder. The rights under a treaty are those things specified which inure to the parties after the treaty has been ratified, and certainly no rights can exist either in a contract or treaty, which is but a contract, unless there has been acceptance by both sides.

It appears to me, and I believe to the casual observer, that the passage of this resolution will accomplish no good but will make confusion worse confounded. Our nationals are entitled to certain rights against Germany which I believe will be relinquished or endangered by the declaration of peace by Congress. The very ships which we seized, valued at more than $25,000,000, are held by virtue of the war. If we declare peace without a treaty how can we establish ownership in foreign ports if they are libeled by unfriendly interests?

While it is true we are in a technical state of war with the Central Powers, it is also true that we are actually at peace with them. Wars are not always ended by official declarations; they often end by lapse of time and lack of action. We have actually been at peace with Germany since the signing of the armistice on the 11th day of November, 1918. We believed this to such an extent that the two millions of soldiers which we had in Europe were brought home and mustered out of service. We have reduced our Army to a peace basis, and there is strong agitation on the part of the people and of Congress that it shall be made as small as internal safety will permit. We have resumed almost without exception peace-time legislation; not alone that, but when President Wilson addressed Congress just after the armistice had been signed, he said, "Thus the war comes to an end." Our business relations with Germany have proceeded at a rapid pace. In 1913 our exports to Germany were $351,930,541; in 1914 they were $158,294,986, a considerable drop owing to the war; in 1920 they had increased to $311,437,377, and for the fiscal year of 1921 they will reach $360,000,000, being greater than the high-water mark of 1913. Germany is buying from the United States as rapidly as her financial condition and resources will permit, and business is flowing between the countries without hindrance or delay.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is a very important matter and I understand these figures will be disputed as to their accuracy, and I will ask the gentleman from what source he got his figures.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I got them direct from the Department of Commerce yesterday.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. How much of the export business was for the purpose of feeding the Americans in Germany?

Mr. LINTHICUM. That was not considered at all in this estimate, that does not go into Germany proper, but into the territory occupied by the American troops.

Mr. MADDEN. How much of the exports were for the starving people of Austria and Germany?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know whether any part went for that purpose, but I hope a substantial amount did go to relieve the starving people, but it was not considered in this estimate. The fact is Germany is buying to the extent of its ability at the present time, and no matter how many peace resolutions you pass, they can buy no more than they are financially able, and they are doing that now.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Section 2 of the peace resolution provides that there are expressly reserved to the United States and its nationals any and all rights, liberties, and so forth, together with the right to enforce the same to which they became entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918. What rights have we under the armistice when we did not ratify it?

Mr. LINTHICUM. We did sign the armistice, but it was supposed to be followed up by a treaty and was so followed by a treaty which was not ratified.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is what I am talking about. Have we any rights under that which we could enforce, when we have repudiated that treaty?

Mr. LINTHICUM. What rights and in what way can we enforce without placing an army in Europe? Certainly we can not do so by declaring it in a resolution. We have withdrawn troops from Europe and we have no power to enforce our rights except perhaps by not recognizing Germany.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Of course the armistice was agreed to.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And on that there was an attempted treaty of peace which we did not ratify. In view of the fact of our absolutely repudiating that, what rights have we in Europe that we can enforce except by sending an army over there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. My argument is that we have not any rights whatever under the contract or under a treaty which we did not ratify.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. It is clearly in evidence and is a fact that the United States obtained some rights against the German Government after we entered into the war. Is not that correct?

Mr. LINTHICUM. That we obtained some rights?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. We should not yield those rights foolishly or throw them away, but we should protect them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is my argument, that we have certain rights as a victor.

Mr. RAKER. This resolution does not abandon those rights that we might have against the German Government.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We do not by this abandon any rights, but my contention is this, that when you declare peace with a country you have no further rights against it as a victor.

Mr. RAKER. We, in fact, are at peace with Germany.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We are.

Mr. RAKER. If by legislation we determine it as a fact and say by this resolution or any resolution in fact that we are at peace, does that change our legal status in respect to rights existing before we passed the resolution?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think it does.

Mr. RAKER. In just what way? Would the gentleman explain?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly. How can we exercise our victor rights over Germany after we have declared peace? We have at the present time the rights as a victor in a great war and under the armistice, but if we declare peace then we are at peace with Germany and she is no longer our enemy.

Mr. RAKER. I know, but this is what I want to get at——

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, I will answer the gentleman if he will get me more time.

Mr. RAKER. My idea is to get some information about this resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Then I suggest that the gentleman should apply to the people on the other side. We did not write this resolution.

Mr. RAKER. But only a few of us get a chance to be heard, and if the rest of us ask a question for information then we are cut off.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I hope this will not be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not. Why, then, this abnormal declaration of peace when peace to all intents and purposes already exists? Why shall we ignore the direct stipulation of the Constitution, which we have adhered to for nearly a century and a half, and assume the power which the Executive has exercised since the Government was founded? Why should we fall over ourselves as it were in "declaring the war at an end"? What benefits will be derived from such action? Germany has not even asked us to do so. She has certainly not stipulated any terms upon which she would accept such action, nor that she will regard it or be bound by it. Why should the matter not be approached in the manner prescribed by the Constitution by a treaty between our Government and the Governments of Germany and Austria? Certainly this proposed mode of procedure will get us nowhere. We have reserved rights which the other country has not conceded except in an instrument which we have rejected. Shall we declare the war at an end, and then seek from Germany rights which we acquired by virtue of the war? What right have we to maintain soldiers upon German soil when we are at peace with her, or collect the $250,000,000 due us for their maintenance except by treaty agreement?

There are rights which we have and which we have reserved by virtue of our participation in the World War. We did not fight the war alone but with certain allies, and it is certainly our duty to stand hitched until the troubles which confront them have been adjusted. It is true that Germany has agreed to the reparations demanded by the Allies, and has partly performed her part of the contract, but it is likewise true that it was largely through our governmental influence that a final understanding was reached. We have sacrificed 100,000 men in battle. We have maimed and destroyed the health of thousands more. Certain rights have been acquired by virtue of the war. Shall we retire from the battle field without a definite and binding adjustment of all these rights and benefits? I had hoped, and I yet believe, that certain agreements will be made under proper treaty by which we will carry out the slogan we so earnestly protested that "this war would be a war to end wars"; that the sacrifices which our people were making were not made in vain; that the boys who sacrificed their lives and the thousands who sacrificed their health and vigor would be given the credit of having brought peace to the world, not alone for the enjoyment of the present generation but for generations yet unborn.

We talk disarmament, and certainly if the burden of taxation is to be lifted from the shoulders of the people, disarmament must come, but was it not provided for in the treaty, and could it not be done better in that manner than in any other? The rights and benefits, the pleasures and happiness which would have come to millions of people by the ratification of the Versailles treaty will be lost to us and to the world by the method proposed, and we will have drifted back to the old order of things. It has been well said, "The great World War will have been fought in vain if the result of it is not the ultimate peace of the world—the maintenance of the world's peace for all the future." Shall we abandon the fight and withdraw from the field?

America entered the war upon high ideals, not for the sordid reason attributed to her by Col. Harvey, our ambassador to the Court of St. James, when he said it was because she was afraid not to fight, nor to save her skin or for the sole interest of America, but because our rights as a Nation were being ignored, international law disregarded and trampled upon, and because of our very high regard for the French nation, whose domains were being devastated by the ruthless hand of the enemy and her people deprived of their homes and lands; because of the feeling of America for Belgium and her people, whose neutrality had been violated and her cities laid waste; because America felt that the Allies stood for civilization, right, and justice against conquest, devastation, and overlordship. [Applause.]

America believed and still believes that victory for the Allies was victory for democracy and the rule of the people. Her ideals were high, the victory of her armies was hailed with great applause, and America became the proud leader of the nations of the world.

Shall we dash those ideals to the earth, those glories to the winds by the passage of this resolution declaring peace by such an unusual method, or shall we emerge by treaty and maintain the proud position we now hold, as has been our custom at the close of all wars in the past?

At that momentous moment when the President looked down those long aisles of caskets at Hoboken, each one covered by an American flag, our beloved Stars and Stripes, and each containing the remains of an American boy who died for his country, he said, with tears streaming down his cheeks, "It must not be again." What is Congress doing to prevent it happening? What is the President advocating to be done during his incumbency of three months?

The country awaits an answer; the world awaits his leadership. Shall we drift on to another cataclysm? I pray not; but things do not right themselves; they must be righted.

Let us not turn our backs upon our past history and precedents. Let us go about this in the time-honored and constitutional manner. Let the President either send to the Senate the treaty of Versailles and ratify it with such stipulations, conditions, or reservations as deemed proper, or else enter into negotiations with Germany and Austria and arrive at a definite understanding embraced in a treaty and ratify same. Then we shall know our rights and obligations, as will the other contracting parties, thus establishing peace, progress, and happiness for all. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question now?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The gentleman has stated that we are now actually at peace.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. But technically at war. I ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, the enactment of this joint resolution will not make us technically at peace as well as actually at peace?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think the enactment of this resolution declaring peace will have just about as much effect as the passing of a resolution declaring prosperity in this country.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Then, after the enactment of this resolution, does the gentleman think we will be technically at war?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I could not say that.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Would we be technically at war or at peace after the enactment of this resolution?

Mr. LINTHICUM. We are now technically at war, but actually at peace. I believe if we pass this resolution we may be technically at peace, if the resolution is constitutional, which I deny.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Then is the gentleman against that?

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman asks the question, I am opposed to the passage by Congress of a resolution declaring peace and taking from the President the time-honored practice of the President dealing with our international affairs. I am opposed to anything which will take from the Executive the power of dealing with the nations of the world as prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Maryland yield for one suggestion in line with that question?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Section 2 of the resolution provides that there are expressly reserved to the United States the rights of the United States, together with the right to enforce the same. I take it that means to enforce by arms. That is the only way those rights can be enforced, and if that be so, then are we really in a technical state of peace, having reserved the right to enforce our rights with arms?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. If the gentleman from Tennessee will read that resolution with his usual observation and astuteness he will realize that the resolution embraces not only our relations with Germany but also our domestic relations, and that the language which he has just quoted necessarily applies only to our domestic relations.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, with the details of this measure there is room for quarrel. The Republican majority is responsible for those details, but each Member of the House is responsible for his vote upon the principle involved.

The instant need of the United States is for European trade. Agriculture is in a state of depression almost unprecedented. There are over four millions of unemployed industrial workers in the United States. If the statesmanship of America be not absolutely bankrupt and prostrate, it will do something toward relieving those conditions. We need European trade. We need a market in Europe for our surplus. Europe needs the surplus. The starving millions of central Europe reach out their hands for our grain and meat products. The naked millions of central Europe are crying for our cotton and wool. They want our products. We want to sell to them. It is time that we take some steps to bring those who want to consume and those who want to sell together. [Applause.]

Germany has been buying in the United States all that she could find money or credit to buy. Austria and Hungary have had neither the money nor credit with which to buy. Germany has now exhausted her means, and our exports to Germany are rapidly dwindling toward the vanishing point. Last year we sold her something over $300,000,000, and it brought prosperity to this country. But even that large trade included very little of our great staple, cotton, and now no cotton at all is being sold to central Europe. That is why the price for cotton has gone so low. In January of this year our German exports dropped to $48,000,000, in February to $38,000,000, in March to $30,000,000, in April to $19,000,000. What will it be in June? Germany has exhausted her ready cash as well as her credit. Austria and Hungary are exporting nothing and buying nothing.

What are we going to do about this situation? I will tell you what we ought to do. Credit must be extended to central Europe to buy what America wants to sell. Credit will be provided unless the statesmanship of this country has gone bankrupt. And how are we going to provide the means whereby central Europe can buy? They can not buy by money exchange, for, of course, they have exhausted their gold. Their present ability to produce is not anything like sufficient to meet the situation. Credits must be extended to the peoples of central Europe—credits by American financiers and credits by our Government to the Governments of central Europe. Arrangements must be made whereby the people of central Europe will be enabled to buy our surplus and we in turn secured in the payment of the money. It is not money that America needs. What we need is markets for our surplus, work for our idle hands.

PEACE NECESSARY FOR COMMERCE.

You can not have an extension of governmental or private credits under existing war conditions. American financiers can not afford to enter into any large plans of financing Europe so long as we are in a state of war. It would be foolish upon their part. Our Government can do nothing to facilitate trade with central Europe or to extend any sort of governmental credit unless we are in a state of peace. Then let us have peace, and let us have done with these quibbles and legalistic arguments over technical points of constitutional law and one piffle and another. [Applause.]

NO EUROPEAN ENTANGLEMENTS.

If I understand anything of the present sentiments of the American people it is that they do not want to enter into any political alliances with European nations. They do not want to become further entangled with the political problems of Europe. They recognize to-day better than ever before the unfitness of the ruling classes of Europe for partnership with American democracy. They recognize that European ideals are not the ideals of America. Our people are unwilling to join with them in hard and fast partnerships. More than ever before do we appreciate Washington's farewell advice against European entanglements.

The world is in ferment—its imperative demand is for peace. The nations have reeled from the madness of war into a state which is neither peace nor war. Out of the welter of blood the world turns to narrow chauvinism and to race antagonism and class hostility. Political revolution, social disorder, and economic stresses threaten the foundations of society. Conditions in certain parts of Europe are unspeakably bad. In the delirium of the world's fever the ground shakes under our feet. Ancient institutions crumble and men no longer lean upon the faiths and ideals which our civilization has cherished. The world is in disorder; any man who does not endeavor to restore peace, confidence, and good will fails in his duty to his country and to mankind.

Now, for the second time, does the House of Representatives come to consider a resolution restoring a state of peace with Germany. Over a year ago a similar resolution was considered and passed by a decisive majority. Nothing has occurred in the meantime which would cause any Member who voted for the resolution then to vote against it now. On the other hand, much has occurred which might change the attitude of those who opposed the resolution then.

PEACE MADE FOOTBALL OF PARTY POLITICS.

Those who supported the peace resolution a year ago have seen their expectations largely realized. Their predictions have been verified. Their fears have been borne out by events. The world cries out for peace, yet America is no nearer to peace to-day than then. We have been adrift and our disturbed conditions are little nearer settled than a year ago. We have seen peace made the football of party politics. A presidential campaign has been conducted largely upon that issue. We have seen public attention diverted from domestic questions of the most vital moment. A great political campaign was carried on. A party has come into power upon an unprecedented majority, has come into power virtually without a program, all because attention was centered upon a false issue. We now witness an administration buttressed by overwhelming majorities in both branches of Congress, confronted by domestic and foreign questions of overwhelming gravity, pursuing a policy of pure opportunism, drifting here and there with every current of public opinion. All our fears are being verified.

The arguments used in opposing the peace resolution a year ago have spent their force. Not one of them remains of weight and validity. Technical doubts of constitutionality have been resolved. Arguments of party loyalty have lost their weight. The American people have spoken upon the issue in so far as it is possible for them ever to speak upon a single issue. The answer is in behalf of those who advocated the peace resolution. So far as public opinion can be tested it has responded overwhelmingly in favor of immediate peace. Democrats who allowed their party to be made to stand as sponsor for peace by treaty only should no longer persist in such self-destroying policy.

NO ACCEPTABLE ALTERNATIVE.

In considering whether we will have peace with Germany by resolution the single alternative presented is peace through the negotiation of a separate treaty. That alternative is unacceptable because of the delay involved in negotiating and adopting a treaty, and further because the present is not an appropriate time for such negotiations. A delay of months must ensue to have peace by treaty—delay for negotiation and delay for consideration by the Senate. In the meantime our economic situation presses for prompt resumption of the fullest trade relations with the Central Powers.

We have a great surplus of raw materials on hand—cotton, wheat, foodstuffs—and our mills need the work that German demand for our manufactured products would create. Agriculture and industry imperatively demand the immediate resumption of trade with Germany, Austria, and Hungary. Those peoples have neither the goods nor money with which to pay for our products. Trade must be carried on upon a credit basis—a basis of both public and private credits such as can not be extended during a war status. Only a status of peace will permit the intimate relations and confidence which will make the grant of extensive credits possible. The Republican Party has passed an emergency tariff measure under the pretense of doing something for the farmers. It is the merest pretense and there can be no realization of benefit from it. If they really wish to do something statesmanlike for the farmers, they should see to it that credit is given to enable Germany to buy from us a million bales of cotton and a hundred million bushels of wheat. That would be of real help to the farmers. Such a transaction would perhaps add 25 cents per bushel to the price for wheat and $20 per bale for cotton. If Members representing great agricultural constituencies want to do something for their people at home, let them vote for immediate peace with the Central Powers and an extension of credit for the purchase of produce. The people of central Europe need the produce. Humanity demands, and our own intelligent self-interest requires that we find a way to furnish it to them.

It is untimely to negotiate a treaty with Germany just now. There are too many cross currents in the world that may not now be wisely dealt with. We may well return to our prior treaties for the present and await a quieter time to decide upon our new relations with the Central Powers.

TREATY OF VERSAILLES NOT POSSIBLE AS AN ALTERNATIVE.

Let it be understood now that the acceptance of the treaty of Versailles, with its League of Nations, is not a possible alternative. The lapse of another year has brought us a better perspective and enables us to see that the Versailles treaty, either with or without its League of Nations, is utterly unacceptable. We see now clearer than before that we must not bind America as does the league and treaty to the position of chronic intermeddler in European quarrels. If we become a party to the treaty, we are bound to see that it is lived up to and that its provisions are carried out. Such an obligation is not only unacceptable to the American people, but violates sound public policy. Few or none of its provisions are for our benefit; they relate in chief to reparations for Britain and France and to international boundaries—to European balances of power, and to a multitude of delicate questions in which we have no interest. The treaty carries the seeds of a hundred wars.

The year passed has further dispelled our illusions. Europe is not ready for democratic partnership. Europe has not yet embraced democratic ideals. We now see that while President Wilson sat at the peace table inspired by visions of a New Order, those who sat with him were animated by the old dreams of conquest and world dominion—that they still cherished the old schemes for exploitation, the old systems of balances of world power. The high hopes of America they did not comprehend. They spoke our language, but did not understand our thoughts. Out of this—the Old World game of deceit, hypocrisy, and selfishness—it was inevitable that our representative should come with defeat. He played square—he could not win in a crooked game.

WON ON THE MARNE, LOST AT VERSAILLES.

That Mr. Wilson was defeated at Versailles there can not now be doubt. He battled bravely, but the odds against him were overwhelming. Of his aims he saved merely the League of Nations; all else was lost. The amazing thing about it all is that the chief objections made by its American critics to the treaty have been founded upon the covenant of the League of Nations. The league was the best part of the treaty. Had the treaty been fair and acceptable we might well have overlooked the faults of the covenant. The covenant is, in effect, a guaranty by which America became surety for the performance of the treaty. With a treaty of justice and good faith the covenant was harmless; with a treaty speaking only of hatred and selfishness it became impossible. Apart from the covenant the treaty had few provisions acceptable to America. It spoke merely a Punic peace, a peace of might, of extreme retaliation, of French implacable hatred and vainglorious militarism, and of British greed for the hegemony of the world. American ideals won on the Marne, but they lost at Versailles.

From the first it is obvious that the treaty must have been to us wholy impossible. Our purposes were benevolent; those of our associates selfish. We asked nothing; they sought everything. We can not be partners with those who hold such divergent aims. We entered the war as a war against war, for shaking off the burdens of armament, for the preservation of democratic ideals, for the principles expressed by the Fourteen Points. The nations associated with us in the war had wholly different aims. They sought to destroy rivals and avenge old wrongs. They dreamed of empire and world possessions. Their hopes dealt with changes in national boundaries, possession of mineral fields, and control of arteries of trade. It was their ideals which were finally embodied in the treaty of Versailles, not ours.

For us the treaty of Versailles is dead. We will not agree to fight for the collection of reparations for Britain and France or in order that they may hold territory seized as the spoils of war. We will not fight that Italy may hold Trieste or France its possessions in Asia Minor. We will not fight that Great Britain may hold Mesopotamia and bestride Africa like a Colossus.

The SPEAKER. The time of gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] ask that everybody who speaks on this resolution have permission to extend their remarks.

Mr. PORTER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that everybody who speaks on this resolution to-day or Monday shall have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the brief space of time to which I must necessarily restrict myself it will be impossible for me to state as completely as I would wish my reasons for opposition to the resolution now pending before the House.

I am unwilling, however, to remain silent and witness the passage of this resolution without an expression of my dissent and disapproval.

Senate joint resolution 16, repealing the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, together with House joint resolutions 74 and 75, were all referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am a member. The resolution now pending is the unhappy and unfortunate offspring of the reference. [Applause.]

To aid and assist in bringing about its passage would be to act falsely to my own convictions, and in my opinion would violate the sentiment of the American people from ocean to ocean.

The objections to the resolution are of a fundamental and very serious nature, as they appear to me.

In stating them I ascribe no improper purpose or design to those who entertain different views. I credit them with patriotic intent but mistaken conclusions.

The leaders of the Republican Party, from what I can learn, have been perplexed and harassed in their consideration of the so-called peace resolutions. This need not cause surprise.

When one wanders in a wilderness of errors, no path is free from obstacles. None guide him to the public highway whose final destination he anxiously seeks. [Applause.]

This truth will be made manifest by reading the provisions of the second section of the resolution now pending, one of which reserves to the United States and its nationals all reparation or damages, which, under the terms of the Versailles treaty, have been stipulated for its or their benefit—a treaty which the Senate of the United States refused to ratify.

This section reminds one of a burlesque opera and at the same time partakes of the character of a moral tragedy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] All bills and resolutions introduced either in the Senate or the House are supposed to be intended to accomplish some purpose and to bring about some beneficial result.

It is very rarely that any resolution is discussed which has no merit whatever. With respect for the opinions and judgment of my colleagues who differ from me, all the so-called peace resolutions, including the one now pending before the House, are without merit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Each and every one of them is a clear violation of the Constitution of the United States, with the observance of which our honor and welfare are inseparably connected.

Not one line can be found in that great instrument which gives to Congress the right and power to declare peace.

The Constitution vests in Congress the power to declare war.

There is no power given to Congress to declare peace and that power can not arise by implication.

It is not a legislative power. This will clearly appear from the minutes of the convention which framed our Constitution. I commend the reading of the proceedings of that convention to all who have any doubt as to the question.

The Supreme Court of the United States has sustained the position which I have just stated—that the termination of a foreign war and making peace does not belong to the legislative body. (United States v. Anderson, 9 Wallace, 56, 70; Higo v. United States, 194 U. S., 315, 323.)

The resolution now being discussed, although not so objectionable as the Senate resolution, known as the Knox resolution, which is a direct insult to the American people, is inconsistent with their honor and manhood and the dignity of our Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The word "repeal" is omitted with a statement that the war is declared at an end.

It carries with it the idea of an unwillingness to assume any longer the responsibilities attached to the resolution of April 6, 1917. Its tendency would be to minimize on the pages of history great memories. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Contrast this resolution with the sentiments expressed by ex-President Woodrow Wilson in a Memorial Day letter, written several days ago, and tell me which should appeal more strongly to a brave people ever ready to assume any responsibility dictated by a supreme sense of duty.

I read an extract from that letter:

> It is our privilege not only to indulge a high and solemn pride and grief for the heroes of that great struggle, but also to rededicate ourselves to the achievements of the great objects for which that war was fought. We shall not be happy; we shall not be able to enjoy the full pride of the day's recollections until we have made sure that the duties that grew out of the war have been fulfilled to the utmost.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

If ex-President Wilson had never penned a line other than upon his veto of the so-called peace resolution which passed this House in 1920, he would be entitled to the unchanging gratitude of his countrymen, and in the years to come little children everywhere throughout this broad land of ours will bow their heads in reverence at the mention of his name long after those who have misrepresented him have passed into oblivion and have perished forever from the memory of men. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Those who advocate the passage of this resolution forget the truths of history.

No nation ever maintained for a long period of time an illustrious place amidst the people of the world which did not preserve the traditions which contributed to its greatness and its glory.

In the historical calendar of every nation which has won a place amidst the civilized people of the world and which has contributed to their advancement there are days set apart which are transmitted from generation to generation.

These days are marked by great and memorable events which have distinguished them and have been connected with them, such as the declaration of the freedom of a people from the chains of tyranny, the advancement of the cause of humanity, which has made the world a happier place for mankind.

This custom is not the offspring of modern civilization. It is born of the love of high ideals.

More than 2,000 years ago upon the plains of Marathon tablets were erected upon which were inscribed the names of the Athenians and Plateans, who gave their lives for the freedom of Greece. The Battle of Marathon was fought on September 12, 490 B. C., and from that day down to the present era the graves at Marathon have warmed the hearts of men through every succeeding age.

Some of these days have become famous as the birthdays of men renowned in war and in peace. To this class belongs the 22d of February—the birthday of Washington—which is honored throughout the world and which is observed with each recurring year by the reading of his Farewell Address within this Chamber.

The tomb of Washington has become the shrine to which all travelers turn. The principles for which he fought have year by year become more fixed in the hearts of mankind. The world is moving on to a higher and grander destiny.

Also the 12th of February, the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, whose love for humanity encircled the globe and embraced the world. [Applause.]

Also the 19th day of January, the birthday of Gen. Robert E. Lee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is a day which appeals to the hearts of all who admire moral and personal heroism as illustrated by its greatest exemplar.

Others are preserved as memorial days of the death of such men, commemorative of their great deeds, which have brought glory and renown to their country.

In the southern portion of our Republic the 10th of May has been generally adopted as Memorial Day. Upon that day the mighty spirit of Stonewall Jackson took its flight to another world, and his last words still ring in the memory of those who followed the flag carried by him with a deathless valor, which won alike the admiration of those who followed him as well as of their brave opponents. [Applause.] "Order A. P. Hill to prepare for action; pass the Infantry to the front; let us cross over the river and rest under the shade of the trees," were his last words, uttered in the delirium of approaching death.

The student of history will observe that some of these days are legislative days, which owe their place in the recollection of men to the great events enacted thereon.

The Fourth of July will ever be recorded on the brightest page of American history, because on that day the Continental Congress declared to the world the independence of the United Colonies. [Applause.]

The 6th of April, 1917, will be remembered through all the ages to come as the day on which the Congress of the United States enacted legislation which called 4,000,000 of men to arms, not alone to keep stainless in its pristine splendor the flag of our Republic, not alone to vindicate our rights upon every pathway of the ocean, but to protect civilization throughout the world.

Let us not seek to avoid any responsibility arising from the provisions of the resolution adopted on that day.

If history be false in its record of that resolution, tradition will preserve it as an inspiration to patriotic heroism for all who dwell in every land from the rising to the setting sun.

Our duty to the American boys who by virtue of the resolution adopted on the 6th of April, 1917, crossed the ocean should of itself prevent the passage of the resolution now before the House.

"Let us cheer for those boys to the ends of the earth,
From the mountain heights to the sea,
In the land where freedom had its birth,
Where manhood still is the highest worth
In the hearts of the noble free.

"Let us drink to those boys who march no more
To the call of the drum and the fife,
Who sail the seas with the soundless shore,
Far out from the harbor of life.

"Across the sea they bore our flag;
Across the sea they brought it back;
Nor did its shining stars e'er drag,
From sea to sea, from crag to crag,
Along war's grim and gory track."

[Applause.]

In the language of Gen. U. S. Grant, who was as generous as he was brave [applause], "Let us have peace"—such a peace as he would have desired were he living to-day; a peace enthroned with garlands won by the heroism of American boys and our allies; a peace which will cast no shadow upon the threshold of any American citizen, but the sunshine of prosperity and happiness, unsullied by any resolution which reflects discredit upon our common country, which does not represent American manhood nor American sentiment and is not worthy of record in American annals. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to this resolution I repeat the words just used by our friend from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN], the words of Grant, "Let us have peace." Peace is necessary for this country. It is urgently neded, not only because without it we can not have passports or free intercourse of our citizens with Germany, not only because we can not have diplomats to negotiate as to trade which we need, and not only because we must settle questions as to the large amount of money in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, but also because by the legislation during the war we can not fund the debt of the United States without embarrassment until peace is proclaimed.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will if I have the time. I have only five minutes.

It is not generally known or remembered that in the act which authorized the issue of the 3½ per cent first Liberty loan, it was provided especially by section 5 of the act of April 8, 1917, that any series of bonds issued should be convertible into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than the rate at which the same were issued, if any subsequent series of bonds shall be issued at a higher rate of interest before the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, the date of such termination to be fixed by a proclamation of the President of the United States.

By section 4 of the act of September 24, 1917, authorizing the 4 per cent second Liberty loan, it was provided also that these bonds might be issued in convertible form—and they were so issued—with the privilege of converting them into bonds bearing such higher rate of interest, at such price not less than par as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe. This privilege, however, did not include United States certificates of indebtedness, war savings certificates, and other obligations maturing in not more than five years from the issue of such obligations, respectively.

The result has been that instead of being able to issue permanent bonds, say for 30 or 40 years, at a rate of interest at which they could be sold at par, with the privilege on the part of the Government to redeem them in four or five years, as was done in the case of our old 10-40 or 5-20 bonds, the Treasury has been forced to adopt the plan of issuing short-term bonds or notes, and billions of Victory bonds are now coming due in 1922 and 1923. We do not know where to find the money to pay them, except by the issue of short-term notes and short-term four and five year bonds, and are continually under the control of the banks. If the United States should attempt to issue a long-term bond, as they ought, bearing say 4 per cent free of taxation, or 5 per cent subject to taxation—and the interest would have to be at that rate at the present time in order to enable the bonds to sell at par—with a provision that the Government might redeem them at any time after a few years if they could borrow at better rates. The United States should do that. There are $1,410,074,350 of 3½ per cent bonds, there are $27,825,000 of the first Liberty loan converted into 4 per cent, and there are no less than $115,600,400 of the second Liberty loan at 4 per cent; so that over $1,560,000,000 of bonds which are now selling at 87 and 88 could demand par instantly, and the holders of those bonds, mostly great capitalists, would get over $200,000,000 which did not belong to them. This is an embarrassment to the United States that ought to be removed by peace and a proclamation of peace. The need for funding our debt is urgent. Let us have peace. Let

Universal peace
Lie like a shaft of light across the land,
And like a lane of beams across the sea.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, no man is more earnestly desirous of peace than I, but I am opposed to this resolution as it is presented now and as it has been presented on former occasions. I am opposed to it for a number of reasons, but fundamentally I am opposed to it because I am absolutely unwilling that the greatest struggle for democracy and humanity in all history be ended on behalf of the United States by a simple ex parte declaration of peace. I am compelled to withhold my approval until a valid and binding treaty has been properly signed and ratified, a treaty that will serve as a guaranty against the recurrence of such a horrible experience as has so recently wrung to the bleeding the hearts of the people of the world and has shaken to the very foundation democratic governments everywhere. Shall peace be declared without regard to the sacrifices that American citizens have made? Shall peace be declared without sounding a note of warning to the ambitious monarchs of the future? To ask the question is to answer it.

I do not believe that Congress has authority to adopt this resolution. It might be said that Congress could pass a resolution declaring a state of peace, but when it undertakes, as is attempted in sections 2 and 4 of the Porter bill, to preserve the rights of America under the armistice agreement signed on November 11, 1918, and under the treaty of Versailles, it transcends the field of a declaration and attempts to make binding certain treaty obligations and clearly falls within the inhibition laid down by the Constitution.

When the Constitution of the United States was in the making, Mr. Butler, a Delegate to the Constitutional Convention, moved to add the words "and peace" after the words which gave Congress authority to declare war, so that the Constitution would read "to declare war and peace," but Mr. Butler's amendment was voted down by the convention, and thus Congress was denied the authority to negotiate peace. The President, by and with the consent of the Senate, two-thirds of the Senators agreeing, was specifically authorized to negotiate treaties and settle international disputes, and I fail to see how any student of government can find any authority under the Constitution for Congress to pass a resolution clearly invading, as this one does, the treaty-making power which the founders of our Government gave to the President and the Senate. This resolution violates the Constitution of the United States, and I can not give it my support.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other objections to this resolution. I do not believe that the resolution will accomplish one thing that its proponents claim for it. They say we want trade with Germany. Yes; we do want trade with Germany and all the world, and as an American citizen no man craves more than I do that America's trade and commerce with the world be restored at once; we want trade so that there will come with it prosperity to the struggling people of this Nation, especially the farmers and producers, whose products can not be sold because the channels of the trade are chocked, but this resolution offers no relief from the condition now prevailing. Its passage will not stimulate trade in any particular, and I quote as my authority for this statement the words of Mr. Harding, President of the United States, delivered on the floor of the Senate on May 15, 1920, when he, as Senator from the State of Ohio, said:

> I do not regard a pronouncement of formal peace as tremendously essential to the welfare of the United States or to the promotion of our trade relationships with the other nations of the world. I do not think a formal declaration of peace is essential to continued freedom from hostilities; I do not think it possible that Germany is likely to resume armed warfare against this Republic in two generations to come; nor does it seem to me necessary to have this formal declaration, particularly in this form, in order to resume our commercial relations with Germany, for they are already more or less resumed, and in the very nature of things trade relations with Germany will be developed according to the needs of that people and our inclination to trade. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7098, 66th Cong., 2d sess.)

The truth is we are trading with Germany and Austria to-day. On June 14, 1919, the War Trade Board of the State Department issued license permitting trade with Germany under certain restrictions, which from time to time have been modified, and the records show that during the year ending in June, 1920, our export trade with Germany reached $400,000,000, which is the highest figure that it had ever attained in the history of America's trade with Germany. The highest mark heretofore reached was in 1913, when our export trade with Germany amounted to $320,000,000, and the passage of this resolution will not materially affect our trade relations with either Germany or Austria. But you can stimulate trade and commerce by the negotiation of a treaty of peace with those countries and the settlement of our international difficulties, so that an equitable basis of exchange can be agreed upon by the various nations of the world, and in this way confidence in international affairs will be restored to such an extent that business men and business concerns will invest their money in foreign securities, and trade and commerce will thereby be greatly stimulated. We must settle the world's difficulties in a legal and constitutional way before the world's trade and commerce will flow unchecked through its usual channels.

During the war every avenue of production in the United States was stimulated. By thrift and the adoption of scientific methods the farmers increased their production until to-day they are producing more per acre and per capita than ever before in our history. Likewise the factories and every other conceivable means of production in the United States have been stimulated to such a point that we are now producing more than ever before. We are producing much more than our country can consume, and if our prosperity is to continue it is absolutely essential that we find a foreign market for the overproduction of this country. Laborers can not find employment, farmers can not find a sale for their products, money will remain very hard to get until the obstructions to world trade have been removed and commerce permanently established. This can only be done by a speedy and permanent settlement of our world problems.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. I will.

Mr. BOX. Assuming that technical peace is so highly to be desired, can the gentleman imagine any reason why the President, in the exercise of the powers assigned to him by the Constitution and by the uniform practice during our history, has not accepted the responsibility of entering upon the negotiation of such a treaty?

Mr. PARRISH. I can not, and I was going to touch on that a little further on in my remarks. But the responsibility rests on the President of the United States. It rests on the Republican majority. It rests upon those who have made so many promises to the people and who have assumed the responsibility of restoring conditions.

The Republicans have been in charge of the legislative branch of this Government for the past two years. They have been in charge of all departments of the Government for the past three months, and yet there has been no official discussion with Germany through representatives or otherwise looking to a treaty of peace. You have done nothing that points in the direction of restoring the unsettled conditions now prevailing. You have simply left things hanging in the air. Uncertainty has been added to uncertainty, delay has been added to delay, confusion has been added to confusion, until the hearts of patriotic men are wearied, and I challenge you to show where this resolution will meet these conditions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It will not do it; it will fall short of that, and the American people will find after the passage of the resolution that it is futile and ineffective.

The majority report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House has placed a most serious indictment against the Knox resolution, which repeals outright the declaration of war. The report states that the resolution is or might be construed as an apology to Germany for our ever having entered the war. I agree with that statement, but deplore the fact that the Republican administration in its desperation to carry out campaign pledges has found itself in such a predicament that it must force this resolution upon the American people. Like Banquo's ghost, it will arise in the future to haunt you; it will arise to embarrass you, and it may arise to do real harm to the American people. You are taking a very doubtful step, and no one can now foresee what the results will be.

But, gentlemen of the House, there is something else in this resolution that goes deeper than any of the things I have mentioned. You are opening the way by which America must make a separate peace with Germany. When we bade good-by to the boys who went across the sea to fight the battles of humanity, to fight for democracy, and to put an end to all war, no man ever suggested to them that the time would ever come in our history when America would ever make a separate peace with Germany. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Have we come to a place where we are going to do that? Are we to desert the cause of the Allies and make a separate treaty? The passage of this resolution is leading in that direction, and you are going to find that it will seriously handicap our representatives at the peace table. You are going to find that Germany, as she has always done in the past, will take advantage of every single technicality that presents itself. We have property in our possession belonging to alien enemies. American citizens have claims against Germany for property and lives destroyed amounting to almost a quarter of a billion dollars. We have ships in our ports that are there by virtue of the declaration of war. We have many other intricate questions which can only be settled around the peace table, and if you pass this resolution you strip America of the advantages won in the war and send her to the peace table as a coequal with Germany, there to be dealt with at arms' length. The rights of our citizens will be unnecessarily jeopardized and millions of dollars' worth of property may be drawn into useless litigation. This resolution will handicap the President in the successful settlement of the many and intricate problems remaining yet to be settled.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is still another very vital reason why I oppose this resolution, and that is the American people were told while the war was in progress that we were fighting to put an end to all wars. Does this resolution meet that pledge? Has America redeemed the promise she made to the boys who have gone down to death on the battle fields of France? Has America redeemed the pledge that she made to the fathers and mothers who gave up their sons in the supreme sacrifice of a Nation's defense? What does this resolution do to protect the future against wars? It does absolutely nothing. As tragic as it is to the American people, you are letting the supreme opportunity of history pass without taking affirmative action to bring about world disarmament or an agreement among the nations of the earth that will secure the future peace of the world.

Why not call a conference of all the nations now? Why not take some positive steps to insure disarmament? Why not do something that is real, something that will lift from the bended backs of the American people the excessive and cruel burdens of war and place hope again in the hearts of the millions of mothers of America who pray for peace? Do you offer this resolution as the panacea for all the ills of mankind? Do you expect it to solve the world's problems? Is this impotent resolution the answer you are giving to the mothers who have sacrificed loved ones in order that there should be no more wars? Is this spineless document the crown you would place upon the brow of the crippled and wounded soldiers? Is this miserable scrap of paper the monument you are erecting to the memory of the thousands of American soldiers who now lie sleeping beneath the poppies in France? No. With all that is in me I answer No, ten thousand times No. May God forbid.

HOUR OF MEETING MONDAY.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TERMINATION OF THE WAR.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, it is inconceivable to me that those opposing the Porter resolution will in one breath say that they are in favor of a peace resolution and in the next breath say that they will not support this particular resolution, although they admit that it does away with the technical state of war. This resolution, as gentlemen on the other side have admitted, does away with the technical state of war, but does not repeal the declaration of war. We terminate the state of war, but we do not expunge from the historical records the declaration of war and we do not erase the names of Chateau-Thierry, Belleau Wood, and the Argonne. That is the distinction between the Porter resolution and the Knox resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the gentleman know that the House of Representatives last year on two occasions passed such a resolution repealing the declaration of war, against which he now inveighs?

Mr. FISH. I hope the gentleman did not vote for it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I did not.

Mr. FISH. Nor did I.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The Republican side of the House voted for it and passed it.

Mr. FISH. Let us see what this resolution accomplishes. It terminates the technical state of war; it leads to the immediate resumption of diplomatic and consular relations and to commercial intercourse. That is what this country is asking for. It is asking for a resumption of trade relations; it is asking for prosperity, and trade relations will lead to prosperity. We have been shut out of the markets of central Europe too long already, whereas for the past two years our allies have been developing their commerce and gaining control of these markets.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I can not yield, as I have only 15 minutes.

In the brief time allotted to me I am going to try to point out what this resolution accomplishes, and there is one logical consequence which I think the gentleman from Tennessee will object to when I tell him that this resolution will probably mean the bringing back of the American troops from Germany. Those troops have already been in occupied territory for two and a half years, longer than the German troops remained in France after 1870. I would like to have the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who is now on his feet, when his time comes, give one good valid reason for keeping our troops there after we have passed a resolution terminating the state of war between the United States and the German Government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry, but I can not yield; the gentleman will have all the time he wants later.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the gentleman intimated that I might object. Of course I do not want the gentleman to put me in an erroneous attitude.

Mr. FISH. After the passage of this resolution why should the American troops, amounting to some 15,000, remain in Germany? Will they stay there to disarm the German nation, which is already disarmed? Will they remain there to collect reparations or indemnities, which the German Government has already begun to pay to the satisfaction of our allies? Finally, will our troops remain in the occupied territory solely to do police duty for Germans in the city of Coblenz? You people know the decision of the American voters in regard to article 10 of the League of Nations. You know that they repudiated the doctrine of sending American troops into foreign lands to decide boundary disputes, and after this resolution goes into effect it will mean that if we keep those troops there they will involve this country into every boundary dispute in Europe that continental intrigue can drag us into. Already there is lurking danger for us on the insistence of some of the French statesmen to invade and seize the Ruhr district, and the Silesian boundary war between the Poles and Germans is an open menace. We asked for nothing for our part in the war, no indemnities, reparations, or territory, and we got just what we asked—nothing at all. Let us get out of Europe and stay out before we are involved in another war.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would it not be an act of war if we keep troops in a nation with which we are at peace?

Mr. FISH. Ah, I think the gentleman is beginning to see light.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What I objected to a while ago was the gentleman undertaking to place me in an erroneous position. I never intimated that I wanted the troops kept in Germany after the declaration of peace.

Mr. FISH. I am very glad to hear the Democratic leader express those views, and I hope he will support my resolution to bring them back when it comes before this House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, the President could have ordered them back in the last three months, I will say to the gentleman, being Commander in Chief of the American Army.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Permit me to ask one question of the gentleman from Tennessee. The gentleman says the President could have ordered them back at any time during the last three months. Could not the President have ordered them back prior to March 4, 1921?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Surely he could. I will discuss that question before this debate is closed.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used seven minutes.

Mr. FISH. I think it is perfectly proper in considering this resolution to consider the causes that impelled us to enter the war, in view of the various opinions that have been stated in this House and throughout the country. It seems to me to be self-evident that we entered into this war because of the insults of the German Imperial Government against this Government; that we entered into the war because of the wanton, ruthless, and murderous attacks against our neutral rights on the high seas; and when we entered the war we did not do so because we were too proud to fight or because we were afraid not to fight. [Applause.] Once in the war we set out to crush German militarism and autocracy, and we did. Let us for a moment, if you will, consider what part we played in this war. I think we are agreed why we entered the war. I also believe that we can all agree on what we accomplished in this war. We should all be able to agree that we turned the tide from defeat into victory at Chateau-Thierry and at Belleau Woods. [Applause.] We can not emphasize this fact too strongly in view of certain statements in high quarters on the part we played in the war.

We did much more than hasten the end of the war—we stemmed the tide and turned it back, thus saving civilization from domination by German militarism. I would not detract from our allies with their enormous casualties, after four long weary years of fighting, but the fact remains that the American Army stopped the Germans at Chateau-Thierry on their march to Paris. It is also true that the American Nation, by making it clear that it had entered into the war to fight to a finish, broke the morale of the German people, and that was what was broken first and not the fighting power of the German Army which was driven out of the Argonne and beyond the Hindenburg line. In the few minutes I have left I want to support that George Washington Democrat from Texas who argued for peace not only with Germany, peace not only within our own country, but peace with the world, through some form of limitation of military and naval armament, because if the nations of the world do not lessen the crushing burdens of the taxpayers for armament, we will have world bankruptcy, and if they do not reduce and limit their mad race for the biggest armament, we will be heading direct to another war which would be even more disastrous and would probably put an end to the civilization of Europe and America. I trust the Democrats on this side of the House, no matter how much they may argue against this peace resolution, will, when the time comes, support it in order to bring peace with Germany and peace at home. I agree with my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] that we should do everything in our power to augment the prestige of this House, but if you want to insist on your rights, if you want to insist on your prerogatives and augment the power of this House, you will vote for the Porter resolution reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House terminating a state of war in place of the Knox resolution that repeals the declaration of war. You now have the opportunity to vote for a peace resolution emanating from the House, and thereby augment the prestige of the House by insisting on its rights and prerogatives. That is the issue, and it is an issue because under the Democratic administration during the war the rights and power of the House dwindled almost out of sight. It may have been a necessary and unfortunate result of the war powers granted to the President, but whatever the cause was it is time now to repair the damage and restore the House to its place of importance under the Constitution and in the regard of the American people. Now, I make my plea to you Democrats, if you are sincerely desirous of a peace resolution, that this is your opportunity to vote according to the views of the majority of the American people who want peace immediately and want peace not only with Germany but with themselves and all the world.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I presume the gentleman's remark connecting my name with this was occasioned by a colloquy I had a few weeks ago here on the floor. At that time I was very anxious to ascertain whether there could be any assurance given that if a peace resolution should pass the troops would be withdrawn. That was the purpose of my inquiry on that day. Of course, the resolution had not yet been formulated. It is now formulated and is before us. Can the gentleman from New York tell us now whether it is the purpose of the President, in the event this passes as it stands here before us in the House, to withdraw the troops from Germany?

Mr. FISH. The "gentleman from New York" can only say that there is a resolution in the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House which calls for the return of these troops as soon as this particular resolution or any other peace resolution is passed and signed by the President.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question right there. I understand the gentleman is strongly in favor of having these troops return home?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The "gentleman from Tennessee" is not expressing any opinion upon that question at this time. I will say to the gentleman as a legal proposition that, in my opinion, if you declare a state of peace, and having said that peace actually exists, you will commit an act of war if troops are kept there [applause on the Democratic side], unless the reservations that are contained in the Porter resolution give the right to keep them there. Whether that right is reserved or not, I do not know, and I am asking before this debate concludes to have some proponent of the resolution, some advocate of it, to construe section 25 and tell us what it does.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The gentleman from Tennessee will agree that the passage of this resolution will pave the way for the return of the troops?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a moment?

Mr. BOWLING. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I ask that I be allowed, after the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING] concludes his remarks, to address the House for 15 minutes. I have been unable to get time from either the Republican or Democratic side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that after the gentleman from Alabama concludes, he have permission to address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Whose time is that to come out of?

The SPEAKER. It would not come out of any time.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Can you not do anything by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House would have the right to permit the gentleman to address it for 15 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Then I suggest that the vote be taken at 4.45 o'clock on Monday instead of at 4.30.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand the desire of the gentleman is to proceed this afternoon.

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. That was his request. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I have listened as attentively as I could to this debate here this afternoon in an attempt to find out just what the reasons are in the minds of the proponents of this resolution for its passage, the necessity for it, and the benefits that will arise from it. And as I have tried to gather and digest what they said, it amounts to this: That trade relations will be resumed, and that we can do more business with Germany and thereby make some money for the people of the United States. Another says that the passage of this will prevent the erasure from the annals of our history of the names of those honorable battle fields in France. That is about as far as you have gotten. One of the gentlemen who debated this matter had something to say about exchange. I did not catch his point. Maybe I was to blame for it; possibly unable to comprehend it; maybe that had something to do with business.

I think, gentlemen of the House, there is something more deeply involved in this than a question of expediency. I do not think that a great, solemn thing like the declaration of peace should be entered into merely because some one, a majority of some party or other, thinks it is an expedient thing to do. We ought to have a higher and a nobler purpose than that. And we all know this afternoon that if that wonderful spiritual exaltation that gripped this Nation on the 11th day of November, 1918, was still buoying us up, we would not listen to a suggestion for a separate peace with Germany for one moment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We would never consider it. We would not think about it at all, because it violates all the honor of this country, and everyone would feel it was a personal insult.

That war cost too much in tears and blood and treasure and effort; the ideals were lifted too high by the spiritual life of the people at the time for us to trample them in the dust now by going back and making a separate peace with Germany. But this resolution is offered in order to pull presidential chestnuts out of the fire. The dominant party has opposed the peace of Versailles and has assailed President Wilson to such an extent that it is impossible for that party to go back now, and they have got to go through the process of making peace by resolution, rather than around a peace table, in order to save their face.

The reason why I am opposed to this resolution is because I think that Congress has no authority in the world to consider it, much less to pass it. All the powers exercised by this Federal Government are derived from the Constitution, and if there is no power given in the Constitution, the Federal Government possesses no power. I shall attempt to give you some quotations from the Constitution and from the history of our country, which, to my mind, establish beyond question that Congress has no authority to pass this resolution.

The Constitution, Article I, section 8, subdivision 11, declares:

The Congress shall have power to declare war.

Article II, section 2, subdivision 2, provides:

He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present shall concur.

Article VI, subdivision 2, provides that:

This Constitution * * * and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land. * * *

The tenth amendment to the Constitution declares that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Section 52 of Jefferson's Manual says:

Treaties are legislative acts. Treaties are the law of the land. It differs from other laws only that it must have the consent of a foreign nation, being but a contract with respect to that nation. In all countries, I believe, except England, treaties are made by the legislative power, and there also if they touch the laws of the land they must be approved by Parliament. * * * By the Constitution of the United States this department of legislation is confined to two branches only of the ordinary legislation—the President originating and the Senate having a negative. To what subjects this power extends has not been defined in detail by the Constitution; nor are we entirely agreed among ourselves. (1) It is admitted that it must concern the foreign nation party to the contract, or it would be a mere nullity, res inter alios actu. (2) By the general power to make a treaty the Constitution must have intended to comprehend only those subjects which are usually regulated by treaties, and can not be otherwise regulated. (3) It must have meant to except out of these the rights reserved to the States, for surely the President and a Senate can not do by treaty what the whole Government is interdicted from doing in any way. (4) And also to except those subjects of legislation in which is given a participation to the House of Representatives. This last exception is denied by some on the ground that it would leave very little matter for the treaty power to work on. The less the better, say others. The Constitution thought it wise to restrain the Executive and Senate from entangling and embroiling our affairs with those of Europe. Besides, as the negotiations are carried on by the Executive alone, the subjecting to the ratification of the Representatives such articles as are within their participation is now more inconvenient than to the Senate. But the ground of this exception is denied as unfounded.

The participation of the House of Representatives in the treaty-making power has been often examined since Jefferson's Manual was written. The House has in several instances taken action in carrying into effect, terminating, enforcing, and suggesting treaties, although sometimes the propriety of requesting the Executive to negotiate a treaty has been questioned. The exact authority of the House in the making of general treaties has been the subject of differences of opinion.

With the citation of these authorities I come to consider the joint resolution now before the House. It will be observed that it is wholly distinct from the joint resolution recently passed by the Senate. In fact, it is a new thing altogether; the whole of the Senate resolution having been stricken out and entirely new matter substituted by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The first sentence of the proposed joint resolution reads:

That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States of America by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at end.

The majority report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs described this section as a "declaration by Congress establishing a state of technical peace," and undertakes to do no more. It further says, "the Constitution vests in Congress all the war powers, among which is the power to declare war, and by necessary implication the power to declare a state of peace." That Congress does possess the power to declare war is beyond dispute, as has been heretofore shown by quotation from that instrument. But nowhere in the Constitution can be found a declaration that Congress has the power to declare peace. These are two wholly distinct functions, and whatever have been the precedents set by other nations it is certainly true of the United States that all wars, which left a responsible nation as adversary, have been concluded by a treaty of peace negotiated by the Executive and ratified by the Senate. For example, the treaty with the Barbary States during Jefferson's administration, the War of 1912, the Mexican War, and the War with Spain. No treaties have been negotiated upon the termination of our various Indian wars, nor the Civil War, for the simple reason that no government was left with which a treaty might be negotiated.

So I do not believe that under the Constitution we can by act of Congress enter into a contract with another Government. The treaty-making power is a high constitutional prerogative of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Beyond doubt, as I interpret the fundamental law of the land, the passage of this resolution is a usurpation of the treaty-making power of the President and the Senate. I do not recall that there has ever heretofore in the history of our country been an attempt to circumvent the treaty-making power by an act of Congress. In answer to the statement of the report submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], that by necessary implication the power to declare a state of peace is vested by the Constitution in Congress, permit me to say that not only is there no such implication in the Constitution, but the history of the Constitutional Convention, which drafted this instrument, established beyond question that such power was deliberately and intentionally denied the Congress. This very question was really anticipated in the discussion in the Federal Convention on August 17, 1787, touching the power that should be bestowed upon Congress.

It will be remembered that James Madison was a member of that famous convention, and kept a journal of its proceedings, the only memorial we now possess of the proceedings of that body. I make the following excerpt from Madison's Journal:

TO MAKE WAR.

Mr. Pinckney opposed the vesting of this power in the Legislature. Its proceedings were too slow. It would meet but once a year. The House of Representatives would be too numerous for such deliberation. The Senate would be the best depositary, being more acquainted with foreign affairs and most capable of proper resolutions. If the States are equally represented in the Senate so as to give no advantage to large States, the power will, notwithstanding, be safe, as the small have their all at stake in such cases as well as the large States. It would be singular for one authority to make war and another peace.

Mr. Butler: "The objections against the legislature lie in a great degree against the Senate. He was for vesting the power in the President, who will have all the requisite qualities and will not make war but when the Nation will support it."

"Mr. Madison and Mr. Gerry move to insert 'declare,' striking out 'make' war; leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks."

Mr. Sherman thought it stood very well. The Executive should be able to repel and not to commence war. "Make" better than "declare," the latter narrowing the power too much.

"Mr. Gerry never expected to hear in a Republic a motion to empower the Executive alone to declare war."

"Mr. Elsworth: There is a material difference between the cases of making war and making peace. It should be more easy to get out of war than into it. War also is a simple and overt declaration. Peace attended with intricate and secret negotiations."

"Mr. Mason was against giving the power of war to the Executive, because not (safely) to be trusted with it; or to the Senate, because not so constructed as to be entitled to it. He was for clogging rather than facilitating war; but for facilitating peace. He preferred 'declare' to 'make.'"

On the motion to insert "declare" in place of "make" (it was agreed to)—New Hampshire, no; Abst.; Connecticut, no; Pennsylvania, aye; Delaware, aye; Maryland, aye; Virginia, aye; North Carolina, aye; South Carolina, aye; Georgia, aye (ayes, 7; noes, 2; absent, 1).

Mr. Pinckney's motion to strike out the whole clause, disagreed to without call of States.

"Mr. Butler moved to give the legislature power of peace as they were to have that of war."

Mr. Gerry 2ds. him. 8 Senators may possibly exercise the power if vested in that body, and 14 if all should be present; and may consequently give up part of the U. States. The Senate are more liable to be corrupted by an enemy than the whole legislature.

"On the motion for adding 'and peace' after 'war,'

"N. H., no; Mass., no; Ct., no; Pa., no; Md., no; Va., no; N. C., no; S. C., no (ayes, 0; noes, 10)—Adjourned."

This quotation from Madison's Journal establishes beyond question that the fathers of the Republic particularly considered and debated the proposition here under discussion and expressly and intentionally refused to give to the Congress the power to make or declare peace. It can not now be successfully maintained that the power to declare peace is by "necessary implication vested in Congress by the Constitution." And any attempt by Congress so to declare is simply a usurpation of power that was intentionally denied it.

In this connection I wish to quote Dr. William Rawle. In his view of the Constitution (Phila. 1829, p. 110–111) he remarks:

Treaties by which peace is completely restored may, as already shown, be made by the President and Senate alone without the concurrence and against the will of the House of Representatives.

It has been made a subject of doubt whether the power to make war and peace should not be the same and why a smaller part of the Government should be intrusted with the latter than the former. Sufficient reasons may certainly be assigned for the distinction. Peace is seldom effected without preparatory discussions, often of length and difficulty, the conduct of which, of course, belongs only to the President and the Senate. War is always an evil; peace is the cure of that evil.

War should always be avoided as long as possible, and although it may happen to be brought on us before observed, without the previous assent of Congress, yet a regular and formal war should never be entered into without the united approbation of the whole legislature. But although a peace is seldom obnoxious and unacceptable to the public, yet its necessity or propriety may not always be apparent, and a public disclosure of the urgent motives that really exist in favor of it may be prejudicial. The people have in such case a stronger motive for relying on the wisdom and justice of the President and the Senate than in the case of ordinary treaties. They are less likely than a larger body to be influenced by partial views or occasional inflammation, and the very circumstance of the smallness of their numbers increases their responsibility to public opinion.

Mr. Joseph Story in his valuable commentaries on the Constitution—Boston, 1873, page 88—contributes the following:

SEC. 1173. In the convention in the first draft of the Constitution the power was given merely "to make war." It was subsequently, and not without some struggle, altered to its present form. It was proposed to add the power "to make peace," but this was unanimously rejected upon the plain ground that it more properly belonged to the treaty-making power. The experience of Congress under the Confederation of the difficulties attendant upon vesting the treaty-making power in a large legislative body was too deeply felt to justify the hazard of another experiment.

Mr. J. I. C. Hare, in his treatise on American Constitutional Law—Boston, 1889, pages 171 and 172—first contrasts the systems of government in the United States and England, and then with reference to the President of the United States, he adds:

He is as much the representative of the entire people of the United States as any Member of Congress can be of his district, and should therefore exercise the discretionary powers confided to him by the Constitution in the way that he may deem best calculated to promote the welfare of the country, which may not be the way deemed best by Congress. Take, for instance, the case of a war which Congress thinks unnecessary or unjust, and wishes to close on terms that the enemy are willing to accept. Still it is the right of the President and not of Congress to determine whether the terms are advantageous, and if he refuses to make peace the war must go on.

We have lived and prospered under the Constitution for 132 years. We are a great and happy people, made so by the operation of this same Constitution of which Gladstone said, "It is the greatest document ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." We should not lightly depart from the faith of the fathers. No argument founded on mere expediency should have weight here. It is not only the high prerogative of the President to make peace by treaties but is a high constitutional duty which should not be evaded. I concur whole heartedly in the desire of the country for peace as soon as possible, but this measure looking to that end is formed along unsound lines and is fraught with untold difficulties. It will be far better for us now and hereafter to follow the simple mandates of our fundamental law rather than to exercise our ingenuity in exploring unknown fields and following unmarked paths. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman already has that right.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, two years and eight months have passed since the signing of the armistice. We discovered in 1917 that Belgium had been invaded in 1914 by a "brutal militaristic power which wanted to dominate the world, and so forth." We were among the last to enter the war. While the other nations have by this time made formal treaties of peace, we have no treaty of peace nor are we ready for one.

The resolution before us is a mere technical resolution declaring the state of war at an end. During the last administration a Republican Senate failed to agree with a Democratic President on a treaty; in this administration a Republican Senate and a Republican House can not even reach an understanding as to how a resolution declaring the state of war at an end should read.

I am inclined to prefer the House form of the resolution in so far as it announces the war at an end instead of repealing the war resolution. But this is a technicality. It will hardly be intelligible to a layman.

It will be impossible to explain a vote against a resolution announced to be a peace resolution. If the Democrats will take the advice of the best Democrat in the House, the Socialist Member from New York [laughter], they would have raised no issue and would have unanimously voted for it. The fact that the Republican majority has seen fit to prevent amendments merely shows that they are expert in the political game, that they have got you Democrats in a trap and that you can not get out of it. [Laughter.]

The denial of an opportunity to amend is a grave injustice. The resolution, after declaring the state of war at an end, proceeds to reserve certain rights under the Versailles treaty, a treaty of conquest, a treaty of physical force, and repudiated by the conscience and the vote of the American people. Would it not suffice for the purpose intended to be carried out by the author of the resolution to say that "in making this declaration, and as a part of it, there are expressly reserved to the United States and its nationals any and all rights to which it or they may have become entitled by virtue of the participation of the United States in the war"?

It is evident from the minority report submitted by the Democrats, as well as from the discussion, that while they are opposed to the resolution they have nothing definite to offer in its place. I could understand them if they would say: "We are opposed to the Versailles treaty, and in order to live up to the high ideals proclaimed by President Wilson, in order to live up to the slogan 'Make the world safe for democracy,' we instruct the President to initiate the organization of a new association of nations, based on the principles proclaimed during the war." But they have no definite suggestion to make; they have no definite basis of peace to propose.

The Republicans are in the same bewilderment. We have had a Republican President since March 4. It is safe to assume that if he had any tangible plan for peace to offer that between election day and this date he would have found the time to reduce his conclusions to concrete form, so that we might have by this time not a mere declaration that the war is at an end, but a treaty of peace. Is it not clear that the reason you Republicans adopt this statement that the war is at an end is that you do not know any more than the Democrats what the terms of peace shall be, and you leave everything to the mysterious future?

You have announced that the League of Nations is dead. Have you anything to substitute for it? Are you willing to permit the Versailles treaty to stand, the League of Nations omitted? Can you from a purely national standpoint permit Japan, the strongest military and feudalistic power, to come out of the war immeasurably stronger than she was before she entered it? Are you willing to concede to her control over the island of Yap and of the other former German possessions in the Pacific and in China? And if not, are we to resort to war to change the unfavorable results of the Versailles treaty?

Are we ready to adopt a policy of isolation? Can we live under modern conditions without close contact with the other nations of the world? Have not the cable, the steamship, and the airship annihilated distances and made the concern of one nation the concern of the rest of the world? As I said this morning during the discussion of the rule, "Any fool can declare war. It takes wisdom to make peace."

We drifted into the war. We do not know how to drift out of it. Our statesmen did not know how to avoid war. They do not know how to make peace. Two years and eight months since the armistice and we do not know what we have been fighting for.

During the last campaign President Wilson contended that he would be ashamed to look a soldier in the face unless Fiume went to Jugoslavia, while a former Republican Senator stated at the Republican national convention that he was not quite certain whether Fiume was near Turkey or was one of the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman suppose that the remark of that Senator may account for the fact that the President did not carry any Republican Senators to Europe with him? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONDON. Very likely.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It might well be that the President would have no use over there for a Senator who did not know any more than that about it.

Mr. LONDON. How could we expect to know the real causes and objects of the war? For years we had been told that the European conflict was none of our concern. The Democratic President was elected on the platform, "He kept us out of war." The Republican candidate for the Presidency never thought of suggesting war. During the war itself all discussion was suppressed. We were continuously being told that it was a holy war; that all our allies and associated powers were white-winged angels, contending with a satanic force located in the center of Europe.

Well, the war ended. The satanic power had been overthrown by his own people. The time came to make peace. Then it became known that conflicting secret treaties had been made; that each of the associated powers wanted a part of the spoils; that the big fellows got everything they wanted; that the little fellows were given little or nothing and were invited to be happy; that cruel and merciless terms were imposed upon the defeated peoples, in spite of the frequent assurances that they would be treated with consideration if they overthrew their government.

We found that a so-called League of Nations had been organized; that national and race hatreds have become intensified; that the whole of Europe had been Balkanized; that under the guise of mandates colonies and peoples had been transferred to the victorious nations. Strangely enough, in almost every case the mandate went to the nation that had by force obtained possession of the mandated territory during the war. We found that a number of small sovereignties had been created with big appetites for more territory. We found that penalties and indemnities had been exacted from the defeated peoples, which threatens to crush them for generations to come.

In connection with this it may be interesting to remind you of the historical fact that after the restoration of the Bourbons Alexander I of Russia insisted that France be treated with consideration, so that she might appreciate that the restoration of a Bourbon saved her from destruction. In the present situation it looks as if the German people are being punished for having overthrown their militaristic government and for having made an effort to establish a social-democratic government.

No wonder the American people are asking themselves, "Where do we come in? We have no international peace, and happened at Versailles. We have been told there will be disarmament, that it was a war to end war, and we see that since the very signing of the armistice armaments have been increasing and wars have multiplied in number."

I can not refrain from reminding you that before we entered the war I asked the question that is now being asked by a majority of the American people. Permit me to quote from a speech of mine delivered on the 17th of February, 1917:

> The kings and rulers of the Old World have so managed it that every one of the belligerent nations in Europe to-day is fighting for something that appeals to sentiment, that appeals to the spiritual man. Poor little Serbia is fighting against extinction. Austria-Hungary seeks national consolidation and an unobstructed road to the Orient. Germany is struggling against being crushed by powerful enemies that surround her on all sides. Russia, the giant of the East—a giant without lungs, because she has no warm-water port—seeks a warm-water port, and says that she entered the combat to help a weaker Slav brother, Serbia. If Italy gets what she started out for, she will restore to herself her "Italia Irridenta," that portion of northern Italy now possessed by Austria. Rumania will get back some of her territory. Every one of those nations, if it wins the war, will have satisfied some national aspiration, some national ideal. Of course, the probabilities are that none of them will have anything to show commensurate with the sacrifices made. What national ideal will the United States satisfy by the war? What will the United States have accomplished if it goes to war and wins? It will have established the right of munition makers to sell munitions. That is the only thing that will be established.

And even that right has not been established. I voted against war. I am glad I did.

The people have everywhere been kept in ignorance on the subject of international relations. As Disraeli said on one occasion:

> The subject of foreign relations is foreign to the people of England.

The ruling interests do not want the people to know the truth.

It is to the eternal glory of the Socialists that in all countries and at all times they have been the only ones that have fearlessly opposed war, militarism, and national aggrandizement, and have everywhere urged amity among the peoples of the earth.

The literature of the socialist movement for the last 50 years abounds with warnings of the catastrophe that has overtaken the world.

To them the World War was not an accident. They foretold its coming. They saw its advent in every battleship that was added to the navies, in every army appropriation, in every colonial venture. They saw its menace in the struggle between France, Italy, Belgium, and England in Africa, between England, France, and Germany in Syria and Mesopotamia, between England and Russia in Asia, and between all of them everywhere.

Markets, concessions, spheres of influence, sources of raw material, opportunities for trade were the things the Governments were fighting for, ostensibly for the people, in reality for the ruling interests. For all the people can get out of a war is the maimed, the dead, and heavy taxes.

In their opposition to war the Socialists courted every form of persecution and were denounced by rulers and their flunkeys as "men without a country." The denunciation of the German Social-Democracy for their having failed to do the impossible, for having been overwhelmed by the superior forces of the imperial German military machine, which defied the armies of the rest of the world during four years, is still a favorite theme with every hypocrite and with every cowardly leader of a mob.

During the war the governments made it impossible for the Socialists to come together at an international conference. Such a conference would have meant the end of the war and the end of many a government based upon the rule by the few.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman has spoken of the lack of program on the part of Democrats and Republicans. Will the gentleman enlighten the House what the program of the Socialist Party is?

Mr. LONDON. I shall come to that presently.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. The gentleman always talks interestingly. He says that the Democrats have not proposed any alternative. Has it not been suggested half a dozen times this afternoon by the Democrats that the alternative is for the President to go ahead and negotiate a treaty with Germany as the Constitution provides, as has always been done and as seems to be his unquestionable duty, and then present it to the Senate in the good old-fashioned way? I think the Democrats have proposed that half a dozen times.

Mr. LONDON. The trouble with the Democrats is that they have not had any new policy since the Democratic Party was formed by Thomas Jefferson. All their wisdom is in the grave. [Laughter.] How can a Democrat, in view of the admitted evil of secret diplomacy, take the position that the House of Representatives, elected every two years, should take no part in determining international relations? Do the Democrats oppose the proposition that the House of Representatives elected every two years from districts, with individual constituencies, should have something to say about the determination of relations with foreign countries? [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. The gentleman will admit that we took our oath to sustain the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Splendid. The Constitution has given the power to Congress to declare war, and it would be unreasonable to assume that the power to declare a state of war does not mean the power to declare a state of war at an end. [Applause.] That goes without saying. Did the Constitution intend that Congress should be an aggregation of so many clerks, so many office boys to put a stamp on the declaration that the state of war exists? In the democracy of those days they were suspicious of the power of the President, and they reserved the power to the branch of the legislature elected by the people to declare war, and, of course, to repeal it. I wish there was more democracy in the domain of international relations to-day.

Since both the Constitution and honor require that a treaty should have the binding force of law there should be full participation of the Representatives of the people in making treaties. Democracy can not exist unless there is democracy in the sphere of international relations.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent in view of the fact that considerable time has been taken up that instead of voting at 4.30 on Monday we vote at 5 or half-past 5.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think, with so many Members absent, that that request ought to be entertained. The gentleman can present it on Monday.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the Chair is not called upon to protect absentees when the House is in session.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair has the same right that every other Member has.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. But the Chair is here.

Mr. MONDELL. I think, Mr. Speaker, the time having been fixed by the House that we ought not now to change it.

Mr. FLOOD. The Chair entertained a request by the gentleman from New York to extend the time.

The SPEAKER. But that did not affect any other Member.

Mr. FLOOD. But it affects a good many Members who are here and who want to speak to-night.

The SPEAKER. There is no reason why they should not. The Chair wishes to be understood. The Chair thinks that it is not fair when the time was fixed for a vote at half-past 4 on Monday to change it with such a small attendance as there is now. It can be changed on Monday if it is thought advisable. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that the time be extended five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I think the gentleman is giving the Democrats an enjoyable and profitable lesson, but will the gentleman not ask the Democratic Party in this House to read the Constitution carefully for the implied powers to Congress?

Mr. LONDON. I want to say that the Republicans are certainly not a bit better. Whatever of disaster may have come out of the war, the blame for it rests as much upon the shoulders of the Republicans as of the Democrats. The President came out with the slogan, "Make the world safe for democracy," and every Republican repeated as if he were a phonograph, "Make the world safe for democracy." When the other slogan, "Stand by the President," was proclaimed, every banker in the country, every financier, shouted it, as did the dweller in the cabins in Arizona or New Mexico—"Stand by the President." It was only when the President came to making peace, and there was a possibility of the Democratic President of the United States becoming the president of the first League of Nations, and so gaining prestige with the American people who love success, that the Republicans took up a fight against the President. You are not a bit better.

Let me answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER]. He asked what is the Socialist attitude. First of all, we were opposed to war. We were logical. We hate every form of physical violence. We are opposed to terrorism of any kind. The success of our philosophy depends upon the triumph of intelligence. We do not believe that any change can be made in human society unless it is a change of the heart, a change of the mind, a change of the soul, and that can not be accomplished by violence. That is why we are opposed to the use of violence in the relations between man and man in society and in the relations between nation and nation.

Take the peace of the Versailles treaty. It is a conqueror's peace, and unless the treaty is thoroughly revised or scrapped it will breed more war.

Our international program would involve, first, the cancellation of all war debts among the allied nations. That must be done, in order to establish economic stability. This war has cost so many millions of lives and so many billions of dollars that we can afford this additional investment. The reestablishment of economic stability will be worth the price. Next, we would revise or wipe out the treaty of Versailles. We would initiate an association of nations based upon democratic principles. We would convoke an international interparliamentary conference, which is to consist of delegates who are to be elected on a democratic basis. We would have the Members of the American Congress, the members of the French Chamber of Deputies, the members of the House of Commons of England, the members of the Chamber of Deputies of Italy, the members of the Reichstag, and so forth, meet and discuss the basic principles of world peace. We would create an international fund out of which credit might be extended in food, raw materials, and machinery to the peoples in need of such aid. We would demand universal disarmament. We would recognize Russia, because no peace which refuses to take into consideration a country with a population of 140,000,000 souls, occupying one-half of Europe and one-third of Asia, can be a lasting peace.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. LONDON. I shall not ask for any more time. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, as one of the junior members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I have sat for several weeks past and listened with great interest to the very thorough and complete debate and consideration of the resolution which is now before this House. As one who lays no claims whatsoever to the attributes of statesmanship, only recently having come from the ordinary walks of life as a plain business man, I have been disposed perhaps to a greater extent than otherwise to look upon this proposition as a business matter, a matter of national business, and therefore of extreme national importance. In speaking of having attempted to discern the business side of this proposition I do not wish to be misunderstood and to be considered as having failed to look into the moral elements involved. The resolution to my mind is the acme of simplicity. In its preamble it makes a simple declaration as to an existence of fact. It does not repeal the declaration of war, nor do I believe that it should do so, but it declares that the war itself is at an end, which no Member of this House will deny as being and as having been for many months past an accomplished fact. After declaring the war at an end, quite logically and quite properly it takes up the care of the rights of American citizens in a proper, definite, succinct, concrete, and businesslike manner.

The American people will not enter a League of Nations. This is not a question which should be considered here to-day. That is water that has gone over the mill, and we are now faced with the incontrovertible fact that the country by a majority of 7,000,000 voters on November 2, 1920, declared itself in opposition to that principle, so we are by the supreme mandate of the people precluded from giving it consideration. "The mill can never grind with the water that is past," and we are faced with the solution of recognized facts and as representatives of a clear-thinking people should act accordingly and proceed to the task in hand.

So far as the merits of the Porter resolution are concerned as compared with those of the Knox resolution——

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman said he wished to discuss the question from a business standpoint. I would appreciate it very much if the gentleman would state what value there is in either one of the resolutions from a business standpoint?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that there is established in business practice the principle that before proceeding toward the negotiation of any business agreement—and I assume that the negotiation of a treaty with Germany will be of more or less commercial import—that we have to have a fundamental foundation or basis upon which to proceed. The President of the United States can certainly not effectively proceed to the negotiation of commercial agreements with Germany and Austria-Hungary so long as a state of war exists. The passing of this resolution is to declare that the state of war is at an end.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman thinks the President could not enter into negotiations for a treaty of peace with Germany without a resolution of this kind?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I did not say that he could not do so. I admit that he could do so; but I can not say it is a proper and businesslike way in which to handle the matter. Now, regarding the Porter resolution and the Knox resolution, I believe the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN] referred to the Knox resolution as being obnoxious. I will not go that far. I was not here to vote upon the resolution at the time that it came up in the preceding Congress, but I believe that the gentlemen who voted for that resolution voted for it because the parliamentary situation was such at that time that this was probably the only thing for which they could vote and bring about a condition which we all desired—the termination of the war. However, the parliamentary situation has changed and the Committee on Foreign Affairs has brought in a resolution which, to my mind, is more in harmony with the desires of the people of this country than the Knox resolution. The doughboys that lie beneath the poppies in France I do not believe would like to have entered upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this Nation any declaration which would repeal or retract the declaration of war with Germany and Austria, both of which I am going to read, for I think we ought to be brought to fully realize the historical import of any repeal of these immortal documents—documents which will in future generations of our children and children's children be cited as having saved the civilization of the world from ignominy of destruction by the most cruel military despotism recorded in the annals of history.

Whereas the Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government, and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Whereas the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a state of war is hereby declared to exist between the United States of America and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the distinguished chairman of our committee, put the proposition very aptly when he said it was no more possible to repeal an established fact than it was to repeal the appropriation which built this building, and I am sure we could all agree with my colleague from New York [Mr. FISH], when he said that the men who lie buried in France and to whose immortal glory the victories of Chateau-Thierry and the Marne are attributed would not desire, were they living to-day, such a reflection and negation of the great forces, moral and otherwise, which impelled us to enter into this great conflict. The causes of the war, which have been discussed by various gentlemen, including the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], are very interesting. I want to make this observation: I am not of a one-track mind, and therefore I do not believe that the causes which impelled us to enter this war were either purely moral or purely economic or purely sentiment, but I think they were a combination of all. There is no question but what the major impelling force, the thing that clapped the climax and brought about the actual declaration, was the continued violation of those moral laws which this country has always cherished, and back of that there was the impelling knowledge that if we did not back up our traditions, that if we did not see that civilization did not perish from the earth, that in the course of time the then great German Empire would gain by the crushing of England, Italy, and France, the hegemony of Europe, and from the victories, flushed by success, would proceed to further wars of conquest and gain the hegemony politically and economically of the world. Therefore I will say that we entered the war because of a mixture of emotions, and we have no apology whatsoever to make for those motives nor do we desire to retract them or negate one single word of the declaration which brought us into the conflict. We Americans are a mixture of the practical and the sentimental, or, perhaps, I should more properly say the spiritual——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to continue for two minutes more.

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I will conclude my remarks by saying this, which I believe brings out aptly and succinctly the point which I want to bring before this House in the discussion of this vital matter, namely, that Americans are a combination of the sentimental and the practical, and we have always kept both eyes on the stars, but in so doing we have always also kept both feet on the ground, and we never look down except to see that our feet are firmly planted on terra firma. Therefore, this proposition is one of expediency, moral and economic. The war is at an end and should be so declared, and I believe that the Porter resolution embodies in a few words everything that the American people desire, and I hope that it will prevail in both Houses, and I am sure our distinguished Executive, President Harding, at the other end of the Avenue will not long delay in negotiating those treaties and agreements necessary for the fullest protection of American rights and American interests, both political and economic. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET].

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I am an orthodox Democrat, and usually fall in line and support measures advocated by the leaders of our party when strictly party questions are under consideration, but the pending joint resolution, in my opinion, does not raise any party issue, and I am going to support it. When war was being waged, I deprecated any effort on the part of Democrats or Republicans who undertook to inject into the debates partisan politics, and I am strongly opposed at the present time to any movement seeking to make discussion of this resolution a party issue. I know full well that some of the Democratic leaders of the House and Senate are opposed to this measure, and the majority of the Democratic newspapers of the country think that all the Members on our side of the aisle should follow the leaders of our party even in voting against the resolution now before us. I think that very many great issues are often beclouded in this House, because Members on both sides of the aisle are constantly looking for something to make political capital out of, and I wish to take this opportunity to suggest to these Members that the people of the country are much more interested in the character of legislation we pass than helping build fences for another political campaign.

Some Members on my side of the House insist that the resolution should not pass because it will accomplish nothing, and further because it encroaches upon the prerogatives of the Executive. They can not show any particular harm that is likely to follow upon its passage, and those advocating the passage of the resolution declare that innumerable and inestimable benefits will follow if a technical state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government is ended. Our party leaders maintain that the President of the United States, under the powers vested in him by the Constitution, can alone make peace by and with the advice and consent of the Senate after war has once been declared, and they refuse to support the resolution on that ground. It at least suspends all of the permanent war laws of the Republic, and thereby fully restores the liberties of our people, which I regard as a very important matter.

The pending resolution is not a treaty, neither was the Knox resolution that passed the Senate. Both are joint resolutions and must be signed by the President to make them effective. The Knox resolution repeals the joint resolution passed by Congress declaring a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial German Government, and the resolution under consideration simply sets forth that the war is hereby declared at an end and has incorporated in it certain language that is intended to safeguard and protect all the rights of American citizens. Both resolutions accomplish the same purpose.

Some of my friends on our side of the aisle say that to pass either of the resolutions would encroach upon the prerogatives of the President; but I understand that the President is anxious for the resolution to pass and has so informed the Republican leaders, both of the House and Senate. When President Harding was carrying on his campaign for the Presidency, and after he was elected, he stated that he would sign such a resolution as soon as it was presented to him. On April 12 last, in his message to Congress, he said:

> The United States alone among the allied powers continues in a state of war against the Central Powers of Europe. This anomalous condition ought not to be permitted to continue. To establish a state of technical peace without further delay, I should approve a declaratory resolution by Congress to that effect, with the qualifications essential to protect all our rights.

In passing this resolution, then, we are doing just exactly what the President asked should be done, and if he feels that it is no encroachment upon his authority for Congress to take this action I do not think that the minority membership of this House should oppose its passage, especially since it is in accord with the wishes of the President and is in conformity to the policies he has set forth since he took the oath of office. But, aside from these considerations, I am constrained to support the resolution because it will afford some relief to the people of my own section of our great country who are in financial distress. Every day urgent appeals are coming from the people begging us to give some relief. It is distressing to know the extremity to which some of the citizens have been reduced during the past few months. It is not because they have nothing, but because they have something and get nothing for it. The farmers of the South have on hand millions of bales of cotton, and there is practically no demand for it. It has been more than two and a half years now since the armistice was signed, and the masses of people want peace. If they can not get peace in the way they want it, they want it the way they can get it. There must be a revival in business and trade before the despondency and gloom which hangs over the country will pass away. One of the best experts on cotton in America recently stated that if peace had been promptly ratified American short-staple cotton would certainly have sold at $1 a pound and there would have been an inadequate supply even if America had produced 15,000,000 bales for 1920. He said, further, that the present condition in the cotton-consuming world is due entirely to the nonratification of peace, which resulted in a nonconsumption, closing the markets of the world to cotton.

I do not know whether these statements are exaggerated or not, but we all know that there is practically no demand for our raw materials. The big interests at first took no notice of the financial distress that pervaded the agricultural districts, and it has been charged by some that they helped bring about these conditions in order to profit from the misfortunes of others. I do not know that these charges are true, but the great financial centers are beginning to realize that something must be done. One of the largest banks in New York recently declared in a circular letter sent out that the cost of manufactured goods was out of all proportion to the returns the farmer is receiving for his raw material. In the circumstances this bank declares that the cost of farm products and raw materials must rise to the level of manufactured goods.

There appeared recently in one of our morning papers an editorial that said:

> Every single farm product has struck the bottom of prewar prices. Manufactured goods have not, wholesale prices have not, retail prices have not, building prices and rents have not, and transportation remains at the war peak.

A prominent New York business man a few days ago said he saw great promise for this country in ending our state of war with Germany, and if there is any probability that the enactment of this resolution into law will bring some relief, by all means, the measure should be speedily passed. Of course, I am more familiar with conditions in the South than other parts of the country, but what we want is a market for our cotton. America can not live alone, and bankers tell us that we must have long-time foreign credit machinery to enable other countries to buy our surplus products, and this can not be done as long as a technical state of war exists between this country and one of our largest export buyers.

The President seems anxious that there be adopted as soon as possible some Federal policy that will give relief to the agricultural interests, and I believe he is sincere, and I for one am unwilling to place in his way the slightest obstacle that will retard the adoption of this policy. The producers of cotton are the hardest hit of any who are engaged in agriculture, and any scheme or legislation that might probably help open up exports of cotton shall have my hearty support. They tell us that we are already trading with Germany and that the passage of this resolution will not aid in increasing our trade. But what trade relations we have with the German people, as I understand it, are conducted through agents of France and England, and we have too much commissions and toll to pay to carry on business in such manner; and, besides, this method is too slow and indirect. By all means, let us remove any barrier that clogs the wheels of commerce.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is wrong about that. If the gentleman will take the trouble to ask the Department of Commerce he will find that while we can not buy dyestuffs to-day, trade in every other article is unrestricted.

Mr. OVERSTREET. My impression was that our trade relations are hampered because we could not buy from Germany.

Mr. FLOOD. We can not buy dyestuffs, but in every other way our trade is unrestricted.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I am a Democrat and believe in party loyalty, but it seems to me that in the economic and industrial crisis through which the world is passing our paramount duty as representatives of the people is to support any measure that will benefit the masses, whether sponsored by Republicans or Democrats. This is no time to think selfishly of our political future. Before us are many problems that need intelligent solution, and while some of you are playing for party advantage, millions of our fellow citizens are suffering and calling aloud to us for help. Believing as I do that the passage of this resolution can cause no harm, and may be the means of doing some good, I shall support it. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, some gentlemen are opposed to this resolution because they assert that it is violative of the Constitution of the United States, yet up to this moment there has not been one of them that has pointed to the section of the Constitution of which it is violative. It would seem passing strange that a power should be given to a great Government to put a thing in motion involving the very life of the Government, and not have the power to stop that which is put in motion when its continuance proves destructive to the peace of that Government. Such a position is not only untenable but it is unthinkable. Suppose we had a President of the United States who would ask Congress to declare war, as Presidents have in times past. The country would enter upon that war in pursuance of a declaration, and that war would continue until the objects that moved us in getting into it had been accomplished. Suppose the President, not satisfied and ready to quit, would still continue the country in a state of war until the very resources had been exhausted, when there was nothing further to accomplish by its continuance, and the life of the Nation was being sapped in the expenditures incident to the upkeep of the war, then would it not be an anomalous position that the representatives of the people or the people themselves might not be able to declare that war had ended or that it should end? Any other position, it seems to me, would be absolutely destructive of this republican form of government.

Another objection is raised, because they say that we are deserting our allies. The facts, if they prove anything conclusively, establish that the Allies, rather than being deserted by us, deserted us. The gentlemen who sat around that peace table at Versailles knew full well that the President of the United States could not bind this country with his signature to that so-called treaty of peace. They knew full well that it took the ratification of the Senate of the United States under the Constitution to bring about a treaty of peace binding the United States. Why, then, did not these gentlemen, representing the allied powers, wait to see whether we were ready and willing to become a party to that contract? They hurriedly signed it and entered, if you please, upon all the powers of that treaty of peace without waiting a day to see whether we would become a party to it. So, if we are to have a treaty of peace, how can we have it except by a separate peace or separate arrangement made with Germany?

There is no other way left open to us. Our allies foreclosed any other way. So that if peace may be had in the future, it must of necessity be a separate peace.

It is unfortunate that we are still technically in a state of war. How much it has cost us it is impossible to calculate. Millions of dollars, it is said, has been lost to us in trade with each passing day. Opportunities that were open to us, had this treaty of peace been made when it should have been made, are now forever closed. Avenues that were inviting the trade of the United States have been taken, if you please, by our enemies and by our allies, who from now on will be our commercial enemies. So that from every standpoint it is vital to the United States and to all her people that this so-called war now come to an end by a resolution, where it should have come to an end by a treaty of peace negotiated by President Wilson unentangled with the League of Nations.

One of the gentlemen closest to the President of the United States—I dare say the closest—who was his right-hand man at Versailles, has said, "If we had set about doing the business that we were sent over there to do, we would have had a treaty of peace before Christmas of 1918." Everyone realizes this now except a very few, that that should have been the first business on hand of those who were gathered at Versailles, namely, to bring about a treaty of peace, and then whatever league of nations or association of nations that might have been favored for the peace of the world could have come later, as they have come in times past. In all the history of the world, when they have gotten up associations of nations or holy alliances, or whatever you may call them, looking to the peace of the world, none of them were ever made a part of a treaty of peace; not one.

So, gentlemen, we are doing the thing now that should have been done many, many months ago. We are doing the thing now that the people of this country wanted done immediately after the armistice; the thing which they expected would be done, and which they had a right to expect would be done, by those who were then in authority. It may be belated, but it is not now too late, and every day that we postpone it we are postponing it, if you please, not only to the detriment of our own people, but also to the detriment of the whole world. I dare say that there is no influence that could be exerted now that would be more beneficial to all the peoples of the earth than to have it known that the great United States, which in the last analysis decided this Great War, had declared a peace. In that declaration they will know that this country is at peace.

A most anomalous position we are occupying. We are the only nation of those that entered into that Great War that seems to be still at war. Yet, as a matter of fact, we are the only nation among all of them that is actually at peace. Every one of those nations which signed the so-called treaty of Versailles and which entered this League of Nations is to-day at war somewhere, and there are more men engaged in war on the other side of the sea at this moment than were so engaged at the end of 1914. So we are acting in accord with the mandate of our people, who are trying now to say to the world, "We are at peace, and we want to assist you in the best way that we can to arrive at that same happy state."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a fact that we are the only Nation of the group of allies that is at peace and we are denied the fruits of peace, while those other nations that are enjoying the fruits of victory are in an actual state of war?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is the situation in which we find ourselves. Yet people contend, without reason, to my mind, that we should still continue to occupy this anomalous position. If we are to be the beacon light of the world, pointing the way to that future universal peace that we all so much desire, why should we technically or otherwise be occupying a position of war? It is absolutely ridiculous and untenable.

Now, let us take and pass this resolution. We should pass it with the same unanimity that we passed the declaration of war. There should be no more dividing line now, when we are seeking that peace, than there was then, when we united shoulder to shoulder to face the enemy. The people then were back of us. They will be with the same unanimity back of us now for peace.

There is a psychological purpose that it will serve. We are all talking here about disarmament; we are all talking about bringing about a better state of understanding among the nations of the earth, whereby we can reduce our armaments. As long as there is war there is reason to be talking about war and more war. The gentlemen who are surrounding us with influences of that kind, trying to exert every influence that they can for great appropriations for the Army and Navy, are constantly referring to the fact that we are in a state of war, and we know not when we will get out of it or when we will be plunged into it again. It will have its psychological effect on them. I hope that the time will speedily come when this Congress can devote its time and attention to other matters than those of war. I hope that the time will speedily come when the appropriations of this Congress may be used for better purposes than killing men. I hope that the time will speedily come when it can no longer be said truthfully that we are spending from 90 to 95 cents out of every dollar of appropriations for war or war purposes. [Applause.] So let us have peace. If we can not have it by treaty, let us have it by this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. He does not seem to be here. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT]. He is not here.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the subject matter before the House demands plain speaking and speedy action. In view of the campaign assurances of last fall and the utterances of President Harding in his first message to Congress the people expected, and had a right to expect, the prompt passage of a peace resolution. The Senate acted promptly and on schedule time. It took the House Committee on Foreign Relations nearly two months to bring a peace resolution before this House, even though a similar peace resolution had passed both the Senate and the House during the second session of the last Congress. No new world conditions existed or arose since the peace resolution passed the last Congress that could not have been anticipated by any man of ordinary intelligence.

Why then the delay in reporting a peace resolution before this body? The Senate resolution undertakes to repeal the war resolution of April 6, 1917, and thus restore us to a state of peace. The House resolution before us undertakes to declare the war at an end and thus restore us to a state of peace. The object sought in both resolutions is a state of peace. Both resolutions admit, by implication at least, that the war resolution of April 6, 1917, has served its purpose and that it has outlived its usefulness on the statute books. The differences in the two resolutions that has caused the delay are not in the object sought to be accomplished, but over words. If anybody has had any doubts over the difference in meaning between the words "tweedledum" and "tweedledee," he can find an ocular demonstration of such difference by comparing the first paragraph of the Senate resolution with section 1 of the House resolution.

Gentlemen, I want to remind you that the American people are going to judge this Republican Congress by its acts, not by its words. We Republicans have got to produce the goods for the American people. The last administration went about with head in the clouds and hearing voices in the air. The American people got their fill of that kind of stuff and turned to the Republican Party for deliverance. It is up to us to get our feet on the ground and to keep them there. The problems before us are very real and of the earth earthy.

The farmers of the Middle West are on the flat of their backs financially. They are going to judge this administration and this Congress by the prices their cattle, hogs, corn, and other products bring, by their ability to get easy credits to carry on their farm operations and to pay off their mortgages. I am fully aware of the limitations of mere laws and resolutions to restore prosperity. But ask any intelligent banker, business man, or farmer what is the chief obstacle to the restoration of business activity in this country and he will tell you that it is a lack of foreign markets for our surplus.

I am for this resolution, not only because there is no sense in being in a technical state of war two and one-half years after hostilities have ceased but because it is the first step toward opening up trade relations between this country and central Europe. It is the first step in getting necessary markets for our surplus, better prices for our farm products, and a restoration of business activity and general prosperity in this country. This is not a question of sentiment but of business. What the people want is not platitudes but markets, not words and phrases but bread and ham and eggs.

While this peace resolution is but a first step, let it be followed promptly by another step and still another step until we have resumed peace and trade relations with every nation and people from Coblenz to Vladivostok. This is what I believe the people demand. It is very evident that the people are beginning to manifest some impatience with this Congress. President Harding began his administration with a popular good will toward him never before surpassed toward any incoming President. The people have confidence in his capacity to deal with complex problems, in his honesty of purpose, and in his sincerity to do that which is best for the country. In his first message to Congress the President urged that a peace resolution should be passed "without further delay." This House will be held responsible for the delay in passing a peace resolution. Let us now, "without further delay," do that which the people expected of us two months ago.

THE BORAH AMENDMENT.

Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor I desire to speak of another related matter upon which the people are a unit, and that is a reduction in expenditures for naval and military armaments. On this they demand action, and action at once. They demand something concrete and possible of speedy accomplishment. Within a few days this House will have before it two very different propositions on the subject of disarmament.

The Borah amendment proposes a conference of the three great naval powers of the world, namely, the United States, Great Britain, and Japan, to arrive at some understanding on a reduction in naval building programs for the next five years. This amendment presents something concrete and definite.

The people can readily understand the scope of this amendment and the object to be accomplished. If reports in the public press can be relied upon, both Great Britain and Japan are ready and willing to enter upon a discussion of that subject with the United States. These three nations are the only nations on earth that will be tempted in the next quarter century to enter into a mad race for naval armaments, unless they come to some understanding or agreement to limit their naval building programs.

The Borah amendment offers something that is possible of speedy attainment. If the Borah amendment is enacted into law this month, there is no reason why the representatives of Great Britain and Japan can not meet the representatives of the United States in the city of Washington next October or November, and before the next naval appropriation bill comes before us we will know if such an understanding can be arrived at, and if such an understanding has been reached we will know what that understanding is.

The question of military disarmament by international agreement is quite a different matter so far as its direct effects on our country are concerned. We are reducing the Army now to 150,000 regardless of the action of any other nation. Next year, with the same disregard of the actions of other nations, we will most likely reduce the Army to 100,000. France to-day has nearly a million men under arms. If France had an army of 4,000,000, or even more, it would constitute no direct menace to us.

To call a conference of all nations to consider the question of military disarmament would involve a delay of several years; and, with the present temper of France, Russia, Turkey, and a number of other nations, such a conference would accomplish nothing of consequence.

The Porter resolution, recently reported to this House, and which some gentlemen are urging as a substitute for the Borah amendment, is indefinite and general in its terms, does not present anything concrete, and, in my humble opinion, if adopted, will accomplish absolutely nothing. Any person who is opposed to any disarmament proposition can with enthusiasm support the Porter resolution as a substitute to the Borah amendment. As a disarmament proposition nothing can be said in support of that resolution, and the Foreign Relations Committee in its five-line report on that resolution does not undertake to say anything in its defense.

Gentlemen, the people are asking for bread. Wisdom dictates that you do not hand them a stone. The people are demanding speedy action from this Congress for relief from the burdens of expensive armaments. Prudence, aye, even the most selfish political expediency, warns against handing the American people an indefinite, meaningless resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TYSON]. He is not here. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY]. He does not seem to be here. May I inquire of the Speaker how the time stands on the two sides?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] has used 19 minutes more than the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has used.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 745. An act to amend section 24 and section 256 of the Judicial Code;

S. 851. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to make settlement with the lessees who erected buildings on a five-year lease on the zone at Camp Funston, Kans., and for other purposes;

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2466. An act to constitute Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, a port of entry and to extend to said port the privileges of section 7 of an act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes";

H. R. 2428. An act granting certain lands to Converse County, Wyo., for a public park;

H. R. 3018. An act granting the consent of Congress to H. H. Haynes to construct a dike across Mud Slough on Isthmus Inlet, in section 23, township 26 south, range 13 west, of Willamette meridian, in Oregon; and

H. R. 5223. An act to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in Riverside County, Calif.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Virginia has no further speakers this evening, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House, under the order previously made, adjourned until Monday, June 13, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

161. A letter from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting report of the Federal Trade Commission on shoe and leather costs and prices, made pursuant to House resolution 217, Sixty-sixth Congress; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

162. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on experiments in the transportation of heavy freights on the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio River and St. Louis, and between Dubuque, Iowa, and Minneapolis, Minn., with the experimental tows and barges described in House Document No. 857, Sixty-third Congress; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

163. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Cape Fear River below Wilmington, N. C., with a view to the construction of jetties (H. Doc. No. 94); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DRIVER, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6209) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within the district of Hana, on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 164), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6672) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within the districts of north and south Hilo and Puna, in the county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 165), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2759) granting a pension to James D. White; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 4613) granting a pension to Mary Lee Love; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 6935) granting a pension to Frederick A. Mackey; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 6946) granting a pension to James A. McGuire; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LONGWORTH: A bill (H. R. 7074) to postpone the increase in the rates of postage effective July 1, 1921, on publications entered as second-class matter under clause (4) of subdivision (b) of section 1101 of the revenue act of 1917; to provide for an investigation of postal costs and postal rates on publications entered as second-class matter, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. KLINE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 7075) authorizing the acquisition of a site for a public building at Mount Carmel, Pa.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. EDMONDS: A bill (H. R. 7076) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LAMPERT: A bill (H. R. 7077) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. McSWAIN: A bill (H. R. 7078) to punish any person profiteering on the United States in time of war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BECK: A bill (H. R. 7079) defining "condensed filled milk," "evaporated filled milk," "concentrated filled milk," and "sweetened condensed filled milk," "sweetened evaporated filled milk," "sweetened concentrated filled milk," and imposing a tax and regulating the manufacture, sale, importation, and exportation thereof; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SWEET: A bill (H. R. 7080) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress amongst the several States under the Fourteenth Census; to the Committee on the Census.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 7081) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. KINKAID: A bill (H. R. 7082) to amend the act entitled "An act to grant a certain parcel of land, part of the Fort Robinson Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Crawford, Nebr., for park purposes," approved June 25, 1906; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

UMI

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 13, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, as we turn toward the week and its duties we desire Thy guidance and that wisdom from above without which we are liable to make mistakes and go far away from the line of duty and responsibility. Give us, we beseech of Thee, Thine own helpfulness this morning and through the week. For Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5010) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference requested by the Senate, and that Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. SLEMP, Mr. SISSON, and Mr. HARRISON were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 2428. An act granting certain lands to Converse County, Wyo., for a public park;

H. R. 2466. An act to constitute Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, a port of entry and to extend to said port the privileges of section 7 of an act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes";

H. R. 3018. An act granting the consent of Congress to H. H. Haynes to construct a dike across Mud Slough on Isthmus Inlet, in section 23, township 26 south, range 13 west, of Willamette meridian in Oregon; and

H. R. 5223. An act to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in Riverside County, Calif.

AVIATION AND ORDNANCE EXPERIMENTS BY ARMY AND NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 11, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: A series of aviation and ordnance experiments will be conducted by aircraft and vessels of the Atlantic Fleet and units of the Army Air Service off the capes of the Chesapeake during the months of June and July, 1921.

The U. S. S. Henderson will be used to carry the guests of the Navy Department to witness these experiments, and, according to present plans, that vessel will leave Washington, D. C., or its immediate vicinity in accordance with the following itinerary:

June 20: Leave Washington a. m. to witness destruction of ex-German submarine U–117 by aircraft and the destruction of U–140, U–111, UB–48 by gunfire from destroyers. Return to Washington upon completion, arriving there p. m. June 23.

June 26: Embark on Henderson in evening; sail at daylight June 27 to witness the search by aircraft for the old battleship ex Iowa, under radio control, and bombing of that vessel with dummy bombs. Return to Washington upon completion, arriving p. m. June 29.

July 12: Leave Washington a. m. to witness destruction of ex-German destroyer by aircraft and the destruction of two other ex-German destroyers by gunfire. Return to Washington upon completion, arriving p. m. July 16.

July 19: Leave Washington a. m. to witness the destruction of the ex-German battleship Ostfriesland by bombing from aircraft and gunfire from battleships. Return to Washington upon completion, arriving p. m. July 22.

It should be noted that this itinerary may necessarily be changed on account of weather conditions and that the trips may be prolonged beyond the periods indicated.

The Navy Department takes great pleasure in hereby extending to the membership of the Senate a cordial invitation to witness these experiments, having in mind that some of the Members, particularly those of the Committees on Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, and Appropriations, might be interested in seeing the exercises. Unfortunately, the suitable accommodations on the Henderson are quite limited, so that I am compelled to ask that the number of Senators who may accept this invitation be limited to 10 for each trip of the Henderson. In order that final arrangements may be made and the designated Senators be advised of all details concerning transportation, it is requested that the Navy Department be informed as soon as possible of the names of those who desire to attend the exercises on each of the four trips of the Henderson.

Sincerely, yours, EDWIN DENBY.

Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
President of the Senate.

COUNTRY ELEVATORS AND TERMINAL GRAIN ELEVATORS (S. DOC. NO. 40).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting a preliminary report of that commission on the profits of country and terminal grain elevators, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Res. 32) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the years 1921 and 1922, reported it favorably with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 111) thereon.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I present the conference report on House bill 6300, the deficiency appropriation bill, and move its adoption.

The Assistant Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on a certain amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 insert the following:

"Provided, That no person shall be employed from the appropriation for the Bureau of Efficiency for the fiscal year 1922 at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except the following: One at $7,500, one at $6,000, one at $4,250, six at $4,000 each, three at $3,600 each, one at $3,500, two at $3,250 each, five at $3,000 each, two at $2,750 each, three at $2,400 each, and five at $2,000 each."

And the House agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES W. GOOD,
J. G. CANNON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to state that the report is presented with the understanding that the name of the third conferee on the part of the Senate, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], should appear on the report. The clerk did not know he was in at the moment the report was prepared, but the Senator approves of the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the report is adopted I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. This is the final report on the deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. I was not in the Chamber the other day when part of the report was adopted. I am wondering if Senate amendment No. 67 to the bill has been agreed to. That amendment reads as follows:

The statement of appropriations, etc., for the third session of the Sixty-sixth Congress shall include the Army, naval, and second deficiency appropriation acts passed during the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and all other appropriations made at the latter session shall be compiled and published with the statement of appropriations for the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. WARREN. That was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if this has ever been done at any time before, so far as his knowledge goes, that, as a matter of bookkeeping, appropriation bills which have been carried over from one session to a succeeding session have been charged up to a prior Congress?

Mr. WARREN. They are not charged as up to a prior Congress. Those appropriations which belonged to the preceding Congress but which did not pass are simply charged up to that Congress to which they relate.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that the naval appropriation bill has passed at this session of Congress; the Army appropriation bill has passed at this session of Congress; and deficiency appropriation bills have passed at this session of Congress. It was revealed as to the last deficiency bill that many new offices were created by that bill, and that appropriations were therein made for what are really not deficiencies but for new expenditures for the fiscal year 1922; but those appropriations are now proposed by the amendment in the pending bill, as a matter of bookkeeping, to be charged up to the last session of Congress.

Mr. WARREN. There is nothing in the provisions of the deficiency bill which charges up anything except what is necessary to show to the public in one book what has been appropriated for the support of the Government in the coming fiscal year of 1922; that is all. It is merely a matter, as the Senator from Mississippi states, of bookkeeping.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, if 10 years later we should look for the appropriations provided by the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress and the appropriations provided by the last session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, the two deficiency appropriation bills and the Army and the Navy bills which have been passed in the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress would be found as being charged up to the appropriations made in the last session of the Sixty-sixth Congress?

Mr. WARREN. They are simply charged up as appropriations for carrying on the Government in the same manner as if they had been passed at some time before the 4th of March, 1921.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but they were not so passed, and yet they would be charged up as against the last session of Congress.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator assumes what the record does not show. There is no charging up about it. It is simply a record of what has happened to provide for the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1922. The bills mentioned should have passed during the last Congress; but failing to pass two of them before the 4th of March, we have passed them since that date. But their standing is the same as if they had been passed earlier, all being for the 1922 fiscal year except a part of one bill relating to certain deficiencies in 1921.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the object, then, if the appropriations are not to be charged up, as a matter of bookkeeping, as having been passed at the last session of Congress?

Mr. WARREN. It is done to accommodate the Senator from Mississippi and other Senators, in order to enable them to ascertain exactly what appropriations have been made for the support of the Government in any given year.

Mr. HARRISON. But that could be ascertained, could it not, if they were charged up again this session?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator in his investigation could charge it up as he might choose.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not investigating; I am merely inquiring in order to ascertain what is the object of the amendment, which the Senator has stated is unprecedented.

Mr. WARREN. The object of the amendment, I repeat, is to accommodate the clerks of the two committees, in order that they may absolutely open and close the books, which are published annually, showing the appropriations for each year, as has always been done.

Mr. HARRISON. Is not there another object of the committee in incorporating this amendment? The Senator's party has laid so much stress on the fact that they were going to cut down the expenses of the Government——

Mr. WARREN rose.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator need not answer me until I have finished, and I have not quite finished. The Senator's party has promised to cut down appropriations to a great extent, and because the head of his party did not come into office until the 4th of March and the President of another party was in office until that time is it not designed that the statement might show to the advantage of the Senator's party in the years to come, three years from now, we might say, or next year, in a campaign, to the effect that these large appropriations were made while the President of another party was in office, notwithstanding your party controlled both branches of the Congress?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi was absent the other day; hence the fog that surrounds him and his politics must have some outlet to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. There is not any politics in it unless from the Senator's party. I am trying to get the facts.

Mr. WARREN. I allowed the Senator to make his remarks, and now I hope he will please wait until I have concluded.

I say to the Senator that politics never entered into the consideration of this matter in any way, shape, form, or manner. The best evidence of that is that Democratic Senators on the other side of the Chamber were entirely agreeable to the proposal when it came from the clerks of the respective Appropriations Committees. At least one of the clerks happens to be a Democrat, and I presume both of them are Democrats. So as the matter stands, if the Senator's suggestion means anything, it means that the Democrats are more to blame than are the Republicans for the manner in which this legislation is framed.

Mr. HARRISON. Why is it, I ask the Senator from Wyoming, that this policy has not been pursued in the years past, where appropriations have failed in one session of Congress and the appropriations have been made during the first session of the succeeding Congress?

Mr. WARREN. It has always been in a similar way when circumstances were the same. The present circumstances are different in that one appropriation bill was at the last moment vetoed because the President thought it too small. The clerk of the committee and others could not remember any other time when the military bill was vetoed at the last minute and had to be passed later on.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the insertion of the provision was not due to the fact that there was a change in the administration?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all in any way.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator from Wyoming for his explanation. It is like I thought it was. And the reasons for its insertion are as I supposed they were.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, when the conference report was originally considered some days ago I was called out of the Chamber and did not know that the report had been presented. I will say that I had not advised the chairman of the committee of my absence, so he is not to blame at all for calling the conference report while I was not present. However, I wish to ask the chairman a question or two with reference to one of the items which were put into the bill when it was pending in the Senate.

I note that the conferees finally agreed with reference to the Shipping Board item to appropriate $61,000,000 for carrying on the work of completing the ships now under way; but the amount which the Senate put on for the operation of the ships during the next year and for the settlement of claims which may have been adjusted by the Shipping Board under the shipping act was eliminated, and nothing was provided either for the payment of the claims or for the operation of the ships. According to the statement of Admiral Benson and those representing the Shipping Board, they will have nothing on the 1st of July for the operation of the ships and for the payment of just claims that have been audited and adjusted by the Shipping Board. I think that is a very unfortunate situation unless some way is contemplated to take care of it; and I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee what the conference committee has in mind as to what can be done, and will be done, to meet that situation, if anything?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Washington is correct as to the testimony of Admiral Benson. The matter was placed before the conferees on the part of the House by the conferees on the part of the Senate with all the force they were able to command. The House conferees very readily admitted that the situation as now portrayed by the Senator from Washington might exist; but they stated that they were unwilling to consent, and not only unwilling but under no circumstances did they feel they could consent, to go any further than the $61,000,000 that the House had provided for in the bill. The chairman of the committee on the other side stated that that was far more than he would have permitted if he could have prevented it. The statement made by each one of the House conferees before we finished was that, owing to the misapplication of the funds, as they termed it, due in part to the many changes in the board, they could not and would not go further until a new board had been appointed and confirmed and had shown in some of its initial steps that they proposed, in the first place, greater economy in the hiring of help, the renting of property, and so forth, and had also given closer attention, as they put it, to the claims, very many of which are awaiting settlement. Finally, after we had worked over the matter until, I think, the third day, it became evident that they would do nothing in the way of enlarging the amount.

Each one of the three members of the conference committee on the part of the House—and, of course, what goes on in a conference committee is not always made public, but I have no objection whatever, and I do not think they have, to making public just what happened—each one stated separately for himself that after a new board was appointed and confirmed and entered upon the discharge of its duties, if there was evidence that the Shipping Board intended to proceed with greater efficiency and more economy, and it then developed that they needed funds, he would support a further deficiency bill or further legislation in the way of a joint resolution to provide the needed funds, but that for the present and in this bill they were obliged to accept and maintain the action of the House as to the Shipping Board appropriation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, the chairman of the Senate conference committee, then, has to a certain extent, the assurance from the members of the House conference committee that if the new board comes in and makes a showing as to the necessity of money for the purposes of the Shipping Board, they will be disposed to meet that necessity.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is correct in that respect. I may state by name the three members of the conference committee on the part of the House. They were Mr. GOOD, of Iowa, the chairman, Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. BYRNS, of Tennessee; but, as the Senator knows, Mr. GOOD, the chairman of the House committee, on the second succeeding day, surrendered his place as a Member of the House, so that there will not be the same three in another conference. The statement I have made, however, shows the drift of opinion, and I think the House conferees represented the opinion of a large number of the Members of the House and probably a majority of the House, and represented that opinion seemingly without regard to politics, but as a matter of policy.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am glad to have the statement just made by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, who was also chairman of the Senate committee of conference. I feel that a very critical situation confronts us with respect to the merchant marine. I appreciate the natural sentiment that comes up when we realize what appear to have been the extravagance, the waste, the incompetency, and so forth, that have characterized the handling of these matters, and yet there are palliating circumstances. I am not going to take the time of the Senate, however, to go into that now. I am glad to note that the committee feel disposed, and that the House Members feel disposed, if a showing is made as to the necessity of money to carry on the operation of our ships, that it will be granted.

Doubtless some of the ships should be tied up for a time, but many of the ships, even though they may be operated at a loss at the present time, should be kept going in order to maintain and develop routes and to maintain our business in American ships.

It is nothing unusual for a business to be carried on for a time at a loss. I was talking with a gentleman the other day who had information with reference to a great British company, the manager of which stated that his company now is running behind $2,500,000 a year, and they expect to run behind for two or three years, but they are meeting that loss out of profits made during good times. The Government is going to have to do something of that kind, and it is a business proposition to do it. I feel that it would be far better for us to stop the construction of some ships rather than to stop the operation of ships.

If we are going to complete ships and then not operate them, we are going to have a double loss; and if we had to dispense with any of the Shipping Board appropriation carried by the bill I would have preferred that a part, at any rate, of the $61,000,000 be left out, and that the work on new ships be stopped for a while, and then, after a while, taken up and the ships finished. But the House provided for the $61,000,000, and they insisted upon that.

In view of the assurance that was given to the chairman of the committee and in view of the attitude of the House Members, I have no complaint to make as to the action of the Senate conferees, although I think it is very unfortunate. As I have said, I am glad to have the assurance of the House Members.

I noted with a great deal of anxiety a statement made some time ago by the chairman of the House committee in debate in connection with the passage of the sundry civil appropriation bill. I have a great admiration for that gentleman; I have no question as to his patriotism and his very great ability and the splendid manner in which he has handled the Appropriations Committee; but he took this attitude growing out of the state of affairs as he contemplated it. I read from page 822 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 30, 1920.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator spoke of the ships tied up. My information before we went into conference was that all of the wooden ships, 272 I believe, were tied up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They ought to be wiped off in some way.

Mr. WARREN. And, furthermore, that four hundred and odd of the steel ships were tied up, but later on it appeared, or was so represented on the House side, that over 600 of the steel ships are tied up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is true.

Mr. WARREN. But, as the Senator knows, there are numerous ships belonging to various maritime nations which are likewise tied up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. All over the world. I am not going to discuss the reasons of that, and so forth; but here is the statement that I referred to, that caused me a great deal of anxiety. The action taken here is in line with this, and nothing could be done more greatly to the satisfaction of our competitors than to follow the policy laid down here.

He said:

> We are not going to appropriate, if I can prevent it, a single penny out of the Treasury of the United States for next year for this board that does not know its business, that is wasting the people's money, and if they are going to get any money they must get it out of the salvage of the plants.

In other words, the chairman of that committee stated upon the floor of the House and said to the world and said to our foreign competitors: "The Government of the United States does not propose to appropriate a penny for the running of its ships, and if those ships are run they must be run out of money gotten from the sale of ships or the sale of its property; and if it does not get enough money to run its ships, its ships will have to be tied up, and the Government will go out of the business."

Mr. President, as I said, no more comfort could come to our competitors from any source whatever than from an adherence to that policy under present conditions. That seems to have been the attitude that was taken by this conferee with reference to this measure; but it is hopeful to know that if a showing is made by the new board that it is absolutely necessary and desirable, from the standpoint of the public interest, to appropriate some additional money to keep some of these ships running, as ought to be done, the Congress will respond to such demands.

They do not have very much time to make the investigation. It will not be long until the 1st of July. I hope they will realize the seriousness of this situation. I shall endeavor to call it to their attention; and I hope they will make such a showing that Congress will see to it that the ships that ought to be run are run, and that whatever claims are adjusted that are just and equitable, the Shipping Board under that provision will be made to pay them.

I know it was contended some time ago that there was $26,000,000 on hand, and that $18,000,000 would come in by the 1st of July, making $44,000,000 available to the Shipping Board; but it was not stated that against this the Shipping Board has obligations of $80,000,000, so that as a matter of fact there will not be money to run and operate these ships on the 1st of July, assuming the statements of the representatives of the Shipping Board to be correct.

They may be incorrect, but I would rather err upon the side of keeping our ships going, running, maintaining our business than by failure to appropriate the necessary money to take them out of business entirely and tie them up at the docks and incur the additional expense of taking care of them.

So I trust that the new Shipping Board will show action that will make Congress have more confidence in it and will also present such a showing here as will warrant us in doing whatever may be necessary to keep running the ships that ought to be kept running even under these adverse conditions.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that another thing that would be of great comfort to our competitors was the statement in the press, as soon as the new Shipping Board was announced, that it had been determined that the Government was to go out of the shipping business. There could not be anything more choice, more desirable in every way, more comforting to our competitors on the high seas than a statement of that sort. I think it rather overlooks the fact, however, that it is for the Congress to determine what the policy shall be with reference to that matter rather than for the Shipping Board or anybody else to do so.

In that connection I will inquire of the chairman whether amendment No. 22 was receded from? It is the Senate amendment on page 17, line 9, which struck out the language in the House bill:

For the completion of vessels now under construction, fiscal year 1922, $25,000,000.

The Senate struck that out with the idea that the adoption of amendment No. 93 would take care of that. Did the Senate recede from that?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that that language was stricken out because it appeared to refer to the coming year and was included later on, where we put in $75,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is what I supposed.

Mr. WARREN. When we went back to take the House provision those lines were restored, so that it reads as it did in the House bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. So the Senate receded from that amendment?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. And it receded also from amendment No. 93?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. In other words, it leaves it exactly as the bill carried it when it came from the House.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the Senator from Florida passes from that subject, I desire to say that I saw a statement in the paper which, as I read it, indicated that the President of the United States had determined that the United States should go out of the shipping business; and I was wondering whether the shipping act confers upon the President of the United States power to determine whether the Government of the United States shall or shall not continue to operate these ships?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there is no question but that no such power is conferred upon the President, and that statement I regarded as a newspaper comment which was wholly inconsistent with the President's public utterances upon that question. He has said from time to time that he proposed to establish and maintain an adequate American merchant marine. That was his idea, and I hope he is still standing to that. What the views of the Shipping Board may be, I do not know.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to hold either the board or the President responsible for statements in the newspapers. I think we will find that many of these statements are mere surmises, guesses, prophecies, and so forth. I am satisfied that no such policy as that is contemplated either by the board or by the President. They probably will try to get our shipping into private hands, privately operated, as soon as it can be done consistently with the interests of the country. There possibly may be some ships the operation of which should not be continued; it might be better for the Government if they should be tied up for a while; but I feel that the new board and the President are going to canvass the whole situation and are not going to act precipitately, but are going to try to meet the interests of the United States and build up our merchant marine by proper action.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution to which there is no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion pending.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not want to object, but I have been sitting here for 40 minutes trying to introduce a bill from the Treasury Department of great importance that will have to be passed in the next 10 days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From the Committee on Mines and Mining I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 32) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the years 1921 and 1922, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. I object. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am quite ready to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania to introduce the bill to which he has referred.

Mr. PENROSE. I shall not object later in the day, but I think now we ought to have the regular order. It is only fair to other Senators who are waiting for important business to proceed with the regular order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I concur with the Senator. I, like himself, have been waiting here for some time to proceed with the regular order. If the Senator is desirous of being heard, I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us proceed with the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is reports of committees.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. PENROSE. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will renew my request as soon as the Senator from Pennsylvania gets through.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2041) for the relief of J. G. Seupelt; and

A bill (S. 2042) authorizing exchanges of lands within the Rainier National Forest in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

A bill (S. 2043) granting a pension to John C. Young (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2044) granting a pension to Wilbert E. Parsons (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2045) granting a pension to Nancy J. Parker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2046) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 2047) granting allowances for rent, fuel, and light to postmasters of the fourth class, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2048) granting a pension to Anna Louise Jenks (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2049) for the relief of Jabez Burchard; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2050) for the relief of Jacob Nice; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENROSE. I introduce a bill recommended by the Treasury Department, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Finance, where it belongs, and which must be passed in the interest of the Government before the 1st of July.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2051) to amend section 3142 of the Revised Statutes, to permit an increase in the number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and in the number of collectors of internal revenue from 64 to 74; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 2052) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the Columbus Hospital, Great Falls, Mont., for the treatment of disabled Government employees (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 2053) granting an increase of pension to Mary O. Lester (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2054) granting an increase of pension to Mary McGowan (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2055) granting a pension to Waldo W. Williams (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2056) granting an increase of pension to Johnson White (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2057) granting an increase of pension to Charles Bess (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2058) granting an increase of pension to James M. Vandusen (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2059) granting an increase of pension to Charles M. Gregory (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2060) granting an increase of pension to John Shinolt (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2061) granting an increase of pension to Ziba A. Redding (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2062) granting a franchise for the purpose of manufacturing and supplying gas and electric current in the districts of Wailuku and Makawao, county of Maui, Territory of Hawaii;

A bill (S. 2063) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric light and power within the district of Hamakua, on the Island of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii;

A bill (S. 2064) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within Kapaa and Waipouli, in the district of Kawaihau, on the island and county of Kauai, Territory of Hawaii;

A bill (S. 2065) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within the district of Hana, on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii;

A bill (S. 2066) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within the districts of North and South Hilo and Puna, in the county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii; and

A bill (S. 2067) to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize and provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a street railway or railways in the district of Honolulu, Island of Oahu,' enacted by the Legislature of the Republic of Hawaii, July 7, 1898, and granting a franchise to the Honolulu Rapid Transit & Land Co. to operate a street railway in the district of Honolulu, providing for the operation of the same, and providing for the purchase of the same by the city and county of Honolulu"; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

A bill (S. 2068) for the relief of Edward J. W. Proffitt; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2069) to authorize the construction of a dam across the Wabash River at Huntington, Ind.; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 2070) authorizing the Miami Indians of Indiana to submit claim to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2071) providing for the printing and distribution of a list of civilian employees of the Government; to the Committee on Printing.

ENFORCED NONPRODUCTION OF COTTON.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, at the request of the Secretary of Agriculture, I desire to introduce a joint resolution that amends the Agricultural appropriation act. I desire now to call the attention of the Senators who come from the cotton States to this matter.

In the appropriation act which will become effective on the 1st of July there is an item of $554,840 for the eradication of the pink boll weevil. This joint resolution, if it becomes a law, will authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to utilize $200,000 of that appropriation to reimburse States for expenses incurred in compensating farmers for losses due to the enforced nonproduction of cotton.

I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; and I should like to say to the Senators directly interested that as soon as the unfinished business is disposed of I shall call the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry together, and they will probably be summoned to appear before the committee.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) for the relief of States in the cotton belt that have given aid to cotton farmers forced from the fields in established nonproduction zones through efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ASSESSMENT WORK ON MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 32, on which I made a report a few moments ago.

Mr. LODGE. Has the morning business been concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been concluded.

Mr. BURSUM. I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withhold any objection to the joint resolution which has just been reported.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to it. I desire, if possible, to have a brief executive session, which I have been asked by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to move. I merely wanted to have the morning business closed so that we could have a brief executive session.

Mr. BURSUM. It will not take more than a few minutes to pass the joint resolution, and if it is not passed before the 1st of July it will be of no value.

Mr. LODGE. I have made no objection to its consideration.

Mr. BURSUM. It is a measure which vitally affects the miners of the West.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, under the existing law the mining claims must be completed by the 1st of July of the present year, and there is a very great desire expressed to have the exemption which has been accorded for the last two or three years extended for the present year. The joint resolution will accomplish that purpose. It apparently has the unanimous approval of the Senators from the mining States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution and the amendment reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 32) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the years 1921 and 1922 was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which requires on each mining claim located and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor to be performed, or improvements aggregating such amount to be made each year, be, and the same is hereby suspended as to all mining claims in the United States including Alaska, during the calendar years of 1921 and 1922: Provided, That every claimant of any such mining claim, in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution, shall file or cause to be filed in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded on or before December 31, 1921, and notice of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution.

The amendment of the committee was, after the words "mining claims," at the end of line 8, to strike out the remainder of the joint resolution and to insert:

In the United States, excluding Alaska, during the calendar year of 1920, and up to and including the 30th day of June, 1921: Provided, That every claimant of any such mining claim in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution shall file or cause to be filed in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, on or before the 1st day of August, 1921, a notice of his desire to hold said mining claim under the provisions of this resolution. And hereafter the labor required under the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be performed during each fiscal year, beginning the 1st day of July and ending on the 30th day of June.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I caught from the reading of the amendment that there is something about excluding Alaska. I want to know whether Alaska is excluded from the benefits of this exemption, and if so, why?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was done on the suggestion of the colleague of the Senator from Washington, who asserted that the Alaskan claimants do not desire the extension which is granted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am very much surprised. I had supposed that there was as much, if not more, necessity for it in Alaska than in the mining States of the West.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not advised as to the considerations which induced the colleague of the Senator to take that view. He is the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and the relation of his State to Alaska is so intimate that the committee felt persuaded to yield to his judgment in respect to the matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The intimate relation of the State of Washington to Alaska is the one thing which made that expression catch my eye. Is this a Senate or a House resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is a Senate joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think I shall not ask that it go over, because of the urgency of the matter; but it will go over to the House, where that phase of it can be considered. It would seem to me that if any section of the country needs the relief, it would be Alaska. But the joint resolution can be passed and the matter will be taken care of in the House.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have the amendment by way of a proviso read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Assistant Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I am fearful that if that proviso is enacted into law at least half of the mining claimants in the West will know nothing of it by August 1, and it will be of doubtful use to those who are not advised of the passage of the law with that proviso.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me say to the Senator that that is the usual provision, and because of the very limited time before the 1st of July we have given to the claimants the opportunity to file until the 1st of August.

Mr. SMOOT. There was no such provision in the last extension.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was in the prototype of all the extensions, the acts of 1893 and 1894.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that, Mr. President, but here we are within a month and a half of the time when this notice must be filed in the recorder's office. I doubt whether one-half of the miners will ever know of that proviso being in the law. We have extended the time for the last three years, and with half of this year passed, it is three years and a half, and it is just simply an exemption of the work necessary under the law. I am fearful, if this proviso goes in, the claimants in the large cities, who see daily newspapers, perhaps will learn of the law and learn of this proviso; but a majority of the miners of the United States will know nothing of this proviso being put in the law, it being different from the extension of the law the last three years and a half.

Mr. BURSUM. That has been the usual requirement in the case of other exemptions. In the case of other exemptions by Congress it has been usual to require claimants to file a notice.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been in years past, with the exception of the last three years. During the war the exemption was allowed because of the fact that it was impossible to secure laborers to do the work; and there was only a straight exemption. Now, we have an exemption with a proviso that if notice is not filed in the mining district by August 1 they shall not be entitled to the exemption.

Mr. BURSUM. It has been customary heretofore for the miners to file notices. I think the miners will be generally advised of the requirement.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senate will disagree to the amendment. There is no necessity for it at all.

If we are going to give these men an exemption of the work upon their mining claims for a year from June 30 of this year, they should all be treated alike, they should all have the exemption, and no advantage should be given to the man in the city, who will see the notice printed in full and a statement of what the provision is. It should apply to the miner who is out on the hills, who perhaps comes into the city but once in six months, and perhaps never sees a daily paper. I say, Mr. President, we should disagree to the amendment and pass the exemption law.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think the fears of the Senator from Utah are entirely unfounded, although I am sure he expresses his firm conviction about the matter. I do not think there is any danger at all that the man who owns a mining claim will not learn about this law. They are all interested in it. They are all inquiring about it. But there is a particular reason why the provision should be found in this particular joint resolution. The exemption has now been extended for three years and a half, and a great many of these claims are really abandoned; the owners never intend to go back and work the claims; they have quit them absolutely. We should not allow an abandoned claim to lie vacant if anybody desires to take it, and without a provision of this character no one would be justified in taking the chance of making a relocation of it.

This is simply for the purpose of requiring the man who intends to hold his claim to make a formal declaration of his purpose to do so. Then, if he does not do so, it is open to relocation by the first comer. The fact that we have been extending this exemption for the last three years, it seems to me, makes it really almost imperative that some declaration of this kind of the purpose on the part of the claimant to hold his claim and to come back and work it again ought to be required.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if there were six months, or even four months' time, there would be no reason for objecting to the provision. But nothing that the Senator has said answers the objection I made to the proviso. I know that if it is put into the law we will have hundreds of locators, after they learn that their locations are no good because of this proviso, coming to Congress for relief. There is no necessity at all to insert the proviso. I think this will be the last extension that will be granted by Congress; in fact, I want to say now that it ought to be the last extension. If we are going to develop mines in the West we can not develop them by continuously exempting the assessment work.

Therefore, Mr. President, it does seem to me that we ought to give them now the same chance they have had the last three years and a half, and have it understood now among all the mining men and the locators of mines that in the future there shall be no exemption, because if the exemption is continued in years to come there will be very few mines developed.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will disagree to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1920 and up to and including June 30, 1921, and fixing the period during which such work shall be performed."

CONDITIONS IN THE COAL FIELDS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 80, providing for an investigation of conditions in Mingo County, W. Va. The resolution was reported favorably by the Committee on Education and Labor and reported favorably by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It is satisfactory to the Senators from West Virginia and has been amended in accordance with their desire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, with due respect for the Senator from California, for whom I have warm personal regard, I object to his request. I do not believe in indiscriminate investigations by Congress of every subject under the sun. I do not think the subject matter of his resolution is a proper subject of investigation by Congress. It is a matter which is now in the hands of the State authorities, the State government, and the State courts of West Virginia, and I think it should remain there. I think there are some things in regard to the rights and functions of the States that Congress should keep its hand off of until absolute and imperative necessity arises to cause it to pursue some other course. I do not think that has yet arisen in this matter, and therefore I object to the request.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Montana will not object to the present consideration of the resolution. It is satisfactory to the Senators from West Virginia, to which State it relates, and has been reported favorably by both committees. An objection will simply require a motion to take it up; and with the Senator's protest now on record, will he not withdraw his objection to the consideration of the resolution, which relates to another State?

Mr. MYERS. I am always ready to oblige the distinguished Senator from California when I can consistently do so, but I have some fixed views on this subject. I think Congress is undertaking investigations galore, and spending its time in the investigation of every subject under the sun, and I do not think there is any occasion for a large majority of the investigations upon which Congress expends time and money.

I think the President of the United States took a very wise course when he refused to interfere in this affair which the Senator from California seeks to investigate and relegated it to the States involved and told them that they must exercise their proper authority in the premises. If there was not sufficient ground for the President to interfere, I do not believe there is sufficient ground for Congress to interfere.

I think there are some things in regard to the rights and functions of States that Congress should respect and keep its hands off of. This matter is in the hands of the State of West Virginia and is being handled by the State courts and the State executive and the State government, and I believe it to be an unwise thing for the Congress of the United States to try to interfere. For that reason I must insist on my objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the Senate resolution just referred to.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution (S. Res. 80), which had been submitted by Mr. JOHNSON May 24, 1921, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, reported by Mr. KENYON without amendment May 26, 1921, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Whereas conditions of violence at present exist along the border between West Virginia and Kentucky; and
Whereas for a long period in the past in the coal fields of West Virginia there have been disturbed conditions which have led to turbulence and violence and bloodshed; and
Whereas the conditions referred to are a menace to orderly democratic government and to the general safety and welfare of the people living in the territory affected: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, or any subcommittee thereof, to be appointed by it, is hereby authorized and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in the coal fields of West Virginia and in the territory adjacent to the border of West Virginia and Kentucky; that said committee ascertain the causes of the recent acts of violence upon said border and of the conditions which have existed, and do now exist, in the said coal fields, and generally investigate thoroughly the causes which have led to conditions which have obtained in the past, and which now exist in said territory, and report its findings and conclusions thereon to the Senate.

The resolution had been reported May 27 by Mr. CALDER, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an amendment, on page 2, to add the following:

The committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit at such times and places as it may deem necessary; the expenses of said investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move, in line 5, page 1, to strike out the word "and" and insert a comma after the words "West Virginia," the purpose of the amendment being to restrict the investigation to the immediate territory which has been recently affected.

Mr. JOHNSON. To this amendment we have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have some views on this subject which I wish at this time briefly to express, whether they may accomplish any good or not. I fail to see where there is any cause for the Senate to investigate the subject matter of the resolution. I fail to see how any good purpose can be accomplished by it. I fail to see any sound reason for it. I think it would be a departure from the proper functions of the national legislative body or either branch of it.

The coal miners of the district who are involved in the controversy sought to be investigated—the striking miners—had a perfect right to go on strike. If they were dissatisfied with working conditions or dissatisfied with the wages they were receiving, or which it was proposed to pay them, they had an absolute right, as free American citizens, to cease to labor and to go on a strike. That is their constitutional privilege. No one can gainsay them that right. They have exercised it.

If the employers do not see fit to grant the terms or the wages demanded by the striking miners, they have a perfect constitutional right as American citizens to refuse to grant those terms or wages. As a result of the miners going on a strike, the mining operators have a perfect right to employ other miners and put them in the places of the striking miners if they can find other miners who are willing to accept their terms. It is simply a matter of private contract and mutual agreement. If other miners take the places of the striking miners, the mining operators and the miners at work have a right to look to the State courts and authorities for protection of the miners who are at work pursuing their avocation. They have a right to expect protection of the right to private employment and private agreement between employer and employee.

If there ensue any unlawful disturbance about it, it is a matter for the State authorities of West Virginia to take jurisdiction of. If there be any violence or any lawlessness, it is a matter for the State courts of West Virginia to punish. It is a matter for the State courts to adjudicate and for the parties to the controversy to thrash out in the State courts. I do not see what Congress can do in the premises. So far as I can see, Congress is without power. Suppose the Senate investigates this condition of affairs, what can Congress do as the result of the investigation? It can not enact any law governing the right of private contract of employment between employer and employee. Congress can not enact any legislation which would abridge the right of contract or remedy the existing conditions of affairs.

If there be any disturbance there the Federal courts have no jurisdiction so long as it is confined within the boundaries of the State of West Virginia. Federal courts have no jurisdiction of offenses against the laws of West Virginia committed on its territory.

I do not see that Congress can enact any law or pass any legislation or that the courts of the United States can take any action which would relieve the conditions there which are complained of. I think that the people who are parties to the controversy should be required to thrash it out amongst themselves, and if they have occasion to resort to the courts, I think they should go into the courts of West Virginia, and if there be any violence or disturbance there that the State courts of West Virginia can not handle by ordinary processes, then it devolves upon the governor of the State to proclaim martial law and call out the State troops. I understand he has done that. What is the occasion for Congress to get into this matter? Where is the excuse for Congress to interfere or intervene in this matter? I do not care who wants the investigation——

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. Has the governor of West Virginia asked to have any such procedure instituted?

Mr. MYERS. He asked help from the President of the United States, and it was refused, and he was referred to his State authorities. They were virtually told to attend to their own business and conduct their own affairs without bothering the United States Government about them. That, I think, was substantially the President's attitude. The President having refused to take jurisdiction of the matter, those interested have now resorted to the courts and the State authorities. I approve of the action of President Harding. I applaud his action in declaring that the Federal Government should keep hands off of this matter until it be thoroughly established that the State government is not able to cope with it. I think he did a wise thing.

If there be no occasion for the President to take hold of this matter, I do not see where there is any call or occasion for Congress to get into it. I do not care who demands the investigation. In this particular instance I have heard, I have read in newspapers, that both sides want an investigation by Congress; that the striking miners want the investigation and that the mine operators want it. I do not care if both of them want the investigation, the public has some rights which should be considered. An investigation would take time and money.

I am willing to vote to appropriate money for anything which is absolutely necessary for the conduct of our Federal Government and the safeguarding and defense of the welfare of the people of the country, but surely it is manifest that the absolute necessities of our Federal Government require appropriations great enough, and I do not believe in appropriating money for something from which I can see no good to come and in which the Federal Government has no legitimate right to interfere or take any action. I do not believe in appropriations of the people's money merely to gratify every desire to investigate something.

It costs something to conduct these investigations. If any good could result from the proposed investigation, I would not object, if it were constitutional and within the scope of Congress, but when no good can be anticipated and where Congress has no legitimate right or authority to interfere I do not believe in wasting the time of Congress and the money of the taxpayers in such matters.

Congress has gone mad about investigating and regulating. It has a perfect mania for investigation and regulation of everything under the sun. It has carried its mania entirely too far. If Congress would abandon its mania for investigating and regulating everything and would go to work and expeditiously enact such laws as are absolutely needed for the welfare of the people of the country, such laws as are within its province and needed to remedy the evils of the times, and dispense with all of its promiscuous investigating, and adjourn at an early day, I think the country would be better off and Congress would have the thanks of the people of the country. It would confer a blessing upon a suffering people.

As I said, I do not care if both sides to this intrastate controversy want an investigation by the United States Senate, it is none of their business to want investigations of things over which the Congress has no jurisdiction, and they should not have it. Let them resort to the proper authority and seek appropriate remedies. They are asking something to which they are not entitled. The taxpayers have some rights.

The parties involved should settle their own controversies and resort to their State governments for help if they need help in settling their differences. The public has left some rights. Even if both sides to this controversy want it investigated, the rights of the public should be considered. I do not believe the interests of the public would be served nearly so well by the investigation by Congress of a matter over which Congress has no jurisdiction, in connection with which it can enact no laws, and concerning which it can do nothing, as they would be served if Congress should confine itself to enacting a few needed laws and then adjourn and go home and let the country and the taxpayers have a rest.

In New York I understand that the clothing manufacturers want Congress to investigate the striking clothing makers' unions on the charge that they are soviet organizations and are disloyal. I am opposed to that also. Let the State authorities of New York handle those matters. The State has facilities for investigating alleged criminality. So I say I do not care which side demands these investigations, I care not from whom the demand may come, I think it an unwise, improvident, and imprudent course for Congress to pursue, that of investigating every industrial disturbance and labor strike, every complaint of employers that strikers are violating their agreement, and every complaint of employees that employers are not treating their employees fairly in some respect.

As the President of the United States has refused to take Federal jurisdiction of this matter, I think it would be improper and uncalled for for Congress to interfere.

The region involved, I understand, is under martial law at the present time by proclamation of the governor of West Virginia. What business have we investigating his proclamation of martial law? What business have we investigating something of which the governor of West Virginia has taken jurisdiction and of which the State authorities are in charge? What right has Congress to interfere when the State authorities are in control, and it may be said in control by directions from the President of the United States to regulate their own affairs and settle their own troubles? I think it would be a futile and foolish thing for Congress to undertake. We investigate too much.

A committee of the United States Senate is now engaged in investigating the condition of the railroads of the country, when I know and I think every Senator in the Chamber knows the cause of the condition in which the railroads find themselves. It is simply because their expenses are disproportionately high to their income; because they are paying out too much money for operating expenses, and their tariff rates on freight and passenger traffic do not afford sufficient income to justify their expenses. Too much money going out and not enough coming in. However, that is a matter over which Congress has jurisdiction if it desires to conduct an investigation. It is a matter which concerns Congress, because it relates to interstate commerce, a subject over which the Government of the United States has direct, immediate, and exclusive jurisdiction. If the United States wants to investigate the condition of the railroads it, at least, has jurisdiction so to do.

There is a resolution pending before the Senate to investigate the strike of the shipping employees, which is tying up the shipping of the country. While I dissent from the advisability of it, yet the same objections can not be altogether urged to such a resolution as can be urged to the pending resolution, because the United States is directly concerned in its shipping. It is owner and operator of a large number of vessels; and the shipping of the country concerns the commerce of the country, in addition to the fact that the United States Government is directly concerned as the proprietor of many of the ships which are involved in that strike. So Congress has, at least, jurisdiction to investigate that matter, if it may see fit to do so. It has the interest of a part proprietor. It has the jurisdiction. The advisability, the justification, is quite another question.

I do not believe congressional investigations of strikes, as a rule, do any good. I think the only result is, generally, to prolong the strike and industrial disturbance. I do not believe that the investigation of the steel strike a year or two ago did any good to anybody or accomplished any good purpose whatever. If I had been present in the Senate Chamber when the resolution providing for that investigation was called up and unanimous consent was asked for its consideration, I would have objected to it. I think the only result that investigation had was to prolong the strike. It did not effect a settlement of the strike, but I think it did prolong it. According to well-authenticated newspaper reports many of the strikers, ignorant foreigners who did not understand our form of Government, were told by designing and unscrupulous leaders that Congress had taken hold of the strike, and if they would hold out a little longer it would not be long before the Government would take over the steel plants and operate them, and then the strikers would get anything they might want. Those statements were made in current newspaper reports, and I think they are reasonably to be believed. The strike was lead by a notorious syndicalist. I believe those statements had much effect in prolonging the strike and causing the strikers to lose heavily in lost wages.

If the pending resolution were adopted, and an investigation were begun, I think, if it had any effect at all, it would simply have the effect of prolonging the strike and causing the strikers to lose more heavily. It is a matter which ought to be settled as a subject of private agreement and according to the right of private contract between employers and employees; a matter which belongs to State courts and the government of West Virginia, if it can not be settled by private agreement amongst the parties in interest.

For goodness sake, I ask Senators have the States no rights or functions at all any more? Are the State lines to be simply obliterated, to be no more than geographical boundaries, just like the boundaries of counties? Are States to have no sovereign functions at all any more; no right of control over their affairs and over disturbances within their confines? Are State courts to have no jurisdiction any more at all over violence, lawlessness, and disorder within their State boundaries? What are we going to do with the States of the United States? Are we to abolish them? We are gradually but surely doing it.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. DIAL. Has there not grown up on the part of the States a tendency to shirk their responsibilities and to lean too much on Congress?

Mr. MYERS. Undoubtedly our legislation has had a very great tendency in that direction. The States are getting so that they now look to the Federal Government for everything. They are literally becoming so that they look to the Federal Government to support the people of the States, to support their State governments, and to take every responsibility off their hands. There seem to be no more State rights, duties, or responsibilities.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator from Montana says that the States are looking to the Federal Government for everything in the way of the control of their business, the regulation of private life and official activities, and their spiritual, moral, industrial, and financial welfare; that all those matters are attended to by the Federal Government. Why should not the States look to the Federal Government? Does the Senator know of anything, from the setting of a hen to the raising of a flag, that this Government is not doing or is not prepared to do for the States and the people thereof?

Mr. MYERS. There is scarcely anything that the Federal Government is not prepared to do for the States and does not insist on doing for them, nowadays.

I know that opposing a resolution of this kind is, to some extent, an ungracious, an unpopular, and a disagreeable thing to do, and it may not do any good at all; but I have observed many of these investigations which I thought accomplished no good, which I thought were positively detrimental and harmful, and I think the time has come to call a halt. I think we ought to stop somewhere; I think we ought to draw some line; and I do not know of a better place to begin, if we are going to begin at all, than on the resolution of the distinguished Senator from California.

I do not think that it offers one single pretext for Federal interference or investigation by Congress. It does not involve the interstate-commerce feature which the investigation of railroads now being conducted involves; it does not have the national and foreign commerce feature as has the shipping strike investigation which is proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

I can not see that the situation in West Virginia has one single appeal to or excuse for Federal interference either by the executive, the legislative, or the judicial branch of the Federal Government. It is purely an intrastate matter, which affects the rights of employers and employees living within and doing business within the State of West Virginia. It affects the government and welfare of the State of West Virginia, and its legislative, executive, and judicial functions. If troops should be called out, they must be called out by the governor of West Virginia, so long as the President of the United States has refused to perform that act; and the governor of West Virginia has already taken that step, I understand. If the function of the courts must be invoked, the right and duty of acting belong to the courts of West Virginia.

I repeat, I can see no good whatever to be accomplished by this resolution. I think it would be an unwarranted interference by Congress with the rights of a State, an idle thing, a waste of time and money. I know of no constitutional authority for either branch of Congress to investigate a matter which is purely intrastate and concerns solely the affairs of the citizens of a certain State.

Of course, I do not suppose there is any way to prevent it if Congress wants to do it. If Congress wants to spend the time and money for doing this, I presume there is no way to prevent it, whether it be a constitutional exercise of authority or not; but I do not believe there is any consitutional warrant under our Federal Constitution for it. I do not think that such activities were contemplated by the framers of our Federal Consitution or that they are included within its provisions.

I have no particular objection to the proposed investigation in this case any more than I had to the investigation of the steel industry strike a year or two ago, nor to some other investigations which have been conducted, but I did not happen to be present when the resolutions providing for these investigations were called up and adopted. I do happen to be present when this one is called up, and I feel that it is my duty to register an objection. I feel that it is time for somebody, however humbly it may be done, to raise a voice of protest against the constant tendency of the Federal Government to encroach upon the rights and duties of the States and to investigate everything that comes within the jurisdiction of the States. I do now protest. I raise my voice in protest against this tendency to usurp the rights of the States and to investigate matters concerning the States which are within the functions of the States and are no business of Congress whatever. The protest may not do any good; it probably will not do any good, so far as material results are concerned; but it will do me the good of having done what I consider to be my duty in having raised a voice against what I believe to be a dangerous, and improper, and a growing practice; a most pernicious practice. I hope the resolution may be defeated.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California a question as to the practical result which he expects to obtain by the proposed investigation. I should like to ask my friend from California, in case the committee finds against the laboring people in that State matter, what it is Congress can do and what the Senator from California thinks it ought to do; and in case the committee should find against the employers, what could Congress do against the employers and what would the Senator from California propose that it should do?

I will remind my friend, who is kind enough to allow me the interrogation, that in his State he has an irrepressible labor trouble. He will some day assert the right of California to manage that labor question according to California's view of it, and when that day comes I shall be shoulder to shoulder with the Senator from California. In the South we have the same sort of question. Hardly a State is free from it. If we are now to send committees into the State of West Virginia, tomorrow some man will request or demand that we send committees into Georgia, Alabama, or Tennessee, as the case may be. I submit to the Senator from California that when we embark upon that policy we take up our anchor, we turn the ship afloat upon a shoreless sea, and no one can tell where the vessel may finally go.

I know that the Senator from California is too earnest a man to deal with trifles or to deal with futilities. I know that he is earnest and practical, and I therefore invite him to state to the Senate what practical results he expects from that investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, just a word in response to the distinguished Senator from Georgia.

This is not the ordinary investigation. This is not the investigation of a mere labor dispute. This is not a choosing of sides between two contending parties engaged in an industrial controversy—not at all. This is an instance where practical civil war has existed for some weeks past. This is an instance where there has been practically a suspension of civil rights. This is an instance where certain private corporations, it is asserted—I do not say that it is absolutely accurate—have arrogated unto themselves the powers of government. This is an instance where a man who is a United States citizen, as has been reported, can not go into certain territory in West Virginia unless a hired detective gives him permission to walk in that territory. I do not know whether those things are wholly true or not. I do not say they are all facts, but I do say they have been asserted; and, on the other hand, there is the assertion that certain men who labor and toil in the mines have become armed bands of guerillas, who have infested the hills of West Virginia and who have shot upon their fellows, and that these armed bands are carrying on a guerilla civil warfare.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. If all that be true, what remedy can Congress apply?

Mr. JOHNSON. Wait a minute; I have not concluded, if you please.

On the one hand, therefore, there is the assertion of the usurpation of government by private owners of private coal mines with privately hired private detectives. On the other hand is the assertion that men who have struck are acting lawlessly, and with arms are carrying on a civil war against their fellows.

These are the two different charges. They have led to a situation that is practically intolerable. We are not going to seek to control that situation by the arms of the United States—not at all. We are not asking that the Government of the United States shall supersede the State government of West Virginia—not at all. We are going, however, to develop a situation there which amounts practically to civil warfare, and to put our finger upon what it is, and what the cause of it is, and in that fashion putting our finger upon the raw sore, exposing it and proving and demonstrating what causes it, then we will see whether or not either State or Nation can afford a remedy.

I do not contemplate by this resolution any immediate legislation, it is true. I do not contemplate that we shall do aught to interfere with the authorities. I do contemplate, however, in a territory where there is practical civil war, and where civil liberty has been denied American citizens, to discover what exists and why it exists, and then, if it be possible, either by State or Nation to apply any cure that may be conceived of.

Let me say to you that this is not a partisan investigation. The Senator from Montana has well said that it is not asked by the one side alone. It is desired by all sides, because the situation is intolerable. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] sits here approving this resolution. His colleague [Mr. ELKINS] does as well. The Committee on Education and Labor unanimously reports it. The Contingent Expense Committee does likewise. Under those circumstances, with a spot that is intolerable, why should not the United States Senate, if it can, do as it has done in the past—render a bit of aid, expose it, and then remedy the conditions which exist?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask one more question. I should like to ask if any of the taxpayers who will have the bill to foot, and who are not parties to the controversy, have asked for an investigation in this case?

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator ask if any such have?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why, one man came to me in respect to this investigation who described himself as a neutral. He owned six houses. He had a handful of bullets that he said had been fired into the very room where his wife and his babe were in a certain town in Mingo County, W. Va.; and as a neutral, as he described himself, in the quarrel over there, he wanted the United States Senate to investigate, so that, if it could, it might lay bare the situation and afford the remedy.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will simply say to that that I think it is that man's duty to look to the State government of West Virginia for his remedy until it may become impotent and unable to render him any relief, and then, on a proper showing, it would be for the President of the United States to take action.

While I am on my feet I simply want to advance one more thought which I overlooked in my imperfect remarks a while ago, and that is that the sooner striking employees and employers who can not come to terms with their employees learn that they must thrash out and settle their own difficulties and not rush, one side or the other or both sides, to the Federal Government for help the sooner strikes and lockouts and industrial disturbances in this country will cease.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I only wish to say to the Senate that it is true that both sides to this difference that exists along the border of West Virginia and Kentucky have asked for this investigation. An authorized committee of mine operators representing the Williamson Operators' Association came to the Senators from West Virginia first and asked that an investigation be had into the conditions there which they regarded as intolerable.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. MYERS. They also asked the President of the United States to interfere, and he refused, did he not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The governor of West Virginia some weeks ago asked the President of the United States to send Federal troops into that territory.

The President declined to send in the troops and suggested that possibly the State government had not done all that it could to quiet the trouble there. Since that time the governor has declared martial law in that immediate vicinity and has seemed to be handling the situation quite satisfactorily. There has been very little violence, if any, for the past two or three weeks.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask another question of the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia further yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. MYERS. Why have Congress investigate the trouble if it be diminishing instead of increasing?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator that of course it is for the Senate to decide, in the interest of the public, what it shall do in this matter. As I stated, the operators asked definitely that the investigation be had, and later a deputation of the Mine Workers' Union came here and asked the same thing; and there being unanimity of opinion that outrages were being committed on both sides—and perhaps there have been some things done on both sides that were irregular and violent—it seemed to me that a Senator hearing both of these sides and these representations, both asking that this investigation be had, could do nothing else than to assent to it, or at least not object to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the trouble about the State of West Virginia putting its finger on the sore?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I stated a few moments ago, the State of West Virginia has put its finger upon the sore. It has a State constabulary law. We have no militia at this time. We have not had time to organize our militia in West Virginia under the reorganization act, but we have a State constabulary law; and almost the entire force—there are only about 85 or 90 in it—are down in that territory, and, as I stated, they are handling the situation satisfactorily. There is no violence there at this time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, can not the State of West Virginia make this investigation itself, for itself?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator that the people on both sides of this question seem to think that the United States Government can do it better.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question is, can the legislature do it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The legislature is not now in session, and it did not do it when it was in session. It did not order such an investigation.

Mr. OVERMAN. The governor can call it in extra session.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator says that both sides down in West Virginia, the employers and the employees, think that Congress can do something. What is the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator, as to the remedies to be applied by Congress, that except as a matter of getting publicity as to the facts in the dispute the chances are very remote of Congress being able to do anything.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Publicity, then, is what is desired?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, in these disputes it is very difficult to get at the actual facts. Charges are made on both sides, and unless some impartial tribunal is called into being before which these contending factions can come, under oath, and give all the facts, sitting in the same room, facing each other, and each refuting the arguments of the other, it seems to be impossible for the public to ascertain what are the real facts.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it seems as if the Senator from West Virginia is proceeding under the idea that the newspaper press has been Burlesonized again. Do we not get publicity through the newspapers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We get a certain amount of publicity in the newspapers.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; a very certain amount.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In West Virginia we think we get too much of it of a certain kind, sometimes.

I happened to be a member of a similar investigating committee when I served in the House, and we went out to Colorado to investigate a strike. Congress took no helpful action as the result of that investigation, or any action at all, but I believe that when we reached the city of Denver, and within two hours had representatives of both the contending factions in a room together, that was the first time during the entire trouble they had faced each other in the same room, where each side could hear what the other said and make proper answer and sift the facts down to find out what had actually occurred.

So, Mr. President, I think about all that can be done by Congress is to give publicity to a hearing held by an impartial tribunal, where both contending factions can appear and listen to each other's evidence and refute it, if possible.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I would like to ask a question or two.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much money does the resolution contemplate shall be spent out of the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no means of knowing how much it is contemplated will be spent, but I should say it would depend very largely upon the length of time it takes to make the investigation. The chairman of the committee told me that he expected to go and spend only three or four days there. If I may judge by a former experience, they will not get well started with the investigation in two or three days. It took the investigating committee of which I happened to be a member six weeks to make the investigation in Colorado.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much did the Colorado investigation cost?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It was pretty expensive, but I do not think I ever saw the figures.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hardly think it cost that much, but it must have cost quite a considerable amount, probably $50,000 or more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the Senator whom he is going to investigate. Are you going to investigate the miners' union?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I presume the operators expect us to investigate the miners' union and the miners' union expects us to investigate the operators.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I supposed; and I presume each side expects to show the other side up with horns. That is usually the way they go about it. The miners' union wants to show that the operators have horns and have done something wrong and the operators intend to show that the miners' union has committed high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is about the situation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator really think it is worth while, since the difficulty is over, as I understand, since there is no immediate hostility down there? The situation has quieted, has it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to be quiet at this time, but I will say that it is rather a tense situation, which may break out at any time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The State authorities have it in hand, have they not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They now have it apparently well in hand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the President has refused to intervene?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; with the military forces of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, of course I recognize the fact that there are times when it is wise for Congress to investigate matters concerning the people of the United States; but we have it from Executive authority, the President of the United States, that this is not a condition in which the Government of the United States ought to intervene. We have it on the statement of the Senator from the great State of West Virginia that there is no immediate trouble, but that the trouble is over; that they have had this fight, and it has quieted down and peace reigns again.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield that I may ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the Senator from Alabama is not familiar with the conditions which exist there. It is true that there is not a pitched battle there every day now, as there was for a brief period; but it is equally true that law is no longer existent in that particular territory, except the law of force.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is most unfortunate. I was in hopes that when the disregard for the law had quieted down, as usually happens in cases of mobs and mob violence, the people would come to a sober second thought and conclude themselves to obey the law.

I recognize that there are some occasions when an investigation is helpful. But there has not been anything said here today which leads me to believe that anything helpful would grow out of such an investigation as is proposed. It is a matter which the President has said it was not necessary to intervene in. The Senator from the State in which the trouble occurred says that what is proposed is to set up a court to let the operator investigate the miners' union and the miners' union investigate the operator. So far as I know that is not likely to bring about peace. An investigation of that kind is more likely to bring about discord, unless the resolution seeks to lead to some affirmative action on the part of the Government of the United States. If it does, I would like to have the Senator tell us what it accomplishes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I believe the Senator who has just propounded this question was the leader of his party in the House when the investigation was made into the Colorado matter, and he knows what it was possible to do and what it was not possible to do at that time, and he can answer that question quite as well as I can, or perhaps better.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When did the Colorado investigation take place?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In 1914 I think it was.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was not the leader of the House at that time, as I had come to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a mere suggestion. What is conveyed to me is that the conditions down there, if you want to look at it from the economic standpoint, have prevented the production of coal, and the coal production in that particular territory has been immensely lessened because of the conditions which exist. That is economic consideration No. 1.

No. 2. The condition there at the present time is not a condition of peace, but a mere suspension of hostilities, and the situation, as the Senator from West Virginia has said, is exceedingly tense. Coal production has not reached what it should be at all, and the appearance of peace is maintained only by virtue of the force that is there. To say that an impartial investigation under the circumstances can not be of any good would seem to say that there never had been an investigation which could have accomplished any results.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not agree with the Senator at all. If I am interrupting the Senator from West Virginia, I will stop now and wait until he gets through.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not at all. I am very glad to have the Senator interrupt.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Here is what I am leading to. I do not say that congressional investigations have not produced results in the past. But take up the proposition which the Senator from California has advanced. He said that there are two good reasons why we should have this investigation, one that the production of coal is retarded, because of this disturbance, and the other that the only reason why hostilities do not break out is because there is force there. Analyze that. I know a great many mining districts in the United States where the production of coal is not up to the standard, or anywhere near up to the standard, because of the panic conditions in the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will allow me on that point, I will say that the operators who operate in that territory now claim that their production is normal—that is, that they are able to fill all the orders they have, and have all the men they need at their mines.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That part of the investigation, then, is settled. If they are able to fill all the orders they have to sell coal, we can not accomplish anything along that line.

Now, along the line of there being hostility between the contending factions, and that it has only quieted because of force, as I understand it, it is the arm of the State of West Virginia enforcing the law, preventing men from murdering each other, which is the force that is complained of. I must say, as far as I am concerned, I do not need any investigation to tell me to sustain the lawful arm of the lawful government.

I merely wish to say that if the Senator from West Virginia, in whose State this investigation is proposed to take place, is willing to stand here in his place and say on his responsibility as a Senator that the passage of this resolution in his judgment would bring about better conditions in his own State than his own State government can work out if left alone, I am willing to support his proposition and agree to the payment of the fifty or hundred thousand dollars it is going to cost. But if we do not have something affirmative in sight in the way of benefit, I must say that I am getting mighty tired of spending money out of an empty Treasury. We might as well recognize the fact that we can dig holes into the Public Treasury as well as the executive branch of the Government, and we have had investigation after investigation in the last two years, costing I do not know how many millions. They deplete the contingent fund of the Senate so fast that we can not make an annual appropriation to keep it up. Every time a deficiency appropriation bill comes in we have to make another appropriation for the contingent fund of the Senate. That was not the case in the old days; we made an appropriation for a contingent fund, and in the main maintained it.

It seems to me that we are getting to a point where we should not as a matter of course pass such resolutions of investigation. If we are going to spend between fifty and a hundred thousand dollars out of the Treasury, we ought to know that some definite result is to be obtained for the good of the people of West Virginia, at least.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply to the Senator from Alabama I will say that this trouble had been going on more or less for a year. About a year ago, or a little more, a strike occurred in that territory and production was interfered with. Later a large proportion of the strikers went back to work in the mines, and since then that has been the cause of the disturbance. Those who went out on strike formed tent colonies near by, have been getting support from the national organization of mine workers, and are maintained there with their families. Of course, the operators had to have houses in which to put the new men, and the old ones, of course, had to leave them, and there has now been more or less effort on the part of those who are out on strike, as is always the case in such disputes, to prevent those who are now employed at those mines from working. But the operators, and others who are in that territory, state that they have enough men in the mines to carry on their mines and fill all the orders they have. Of course, we all know that the coal business is, like other businesses, very slack at this time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, did we not have an investigation of a coal miners' strike in West Virginia some years ago?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There was an investigation of the Cabin Creek, Kanawha County, strike.

Mr. OVERMAN. The people of West Virginia do not want Congress to investigate every strike that takes place in the coal mines of West Virginia, do they?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Most of the State of West Virginia is in a state of absolute peace and quietude, and a condition of brotherly love is maintained throughout the State, although we have had some of these disturbances. Whether that investigation was helpful or not, I can not say. If this one is undertaken I hope it will be beneficial, and I believe that the ascertainment of the facts in this case will be helpful.

Mr. OVERMAN. Helpful to the miners?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Helpful to the public generally in tending to quiet conditions.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will say to me that West Virginia can not handle the question itself, and is impotent, I shall be very glad to support the resolution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is on the border between two States, and the trouble exists on the Kentucky side as well as on the West Virginia side. That makes it more difficult for the State government to handle it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has some nominations that he is very anxious to dispose of in executive session. I have been waiting all morning to give him the opportunity. It will take only about 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will not the Senator let me have the resolution disposed of? The debate has been concluded.

Mr. NORRIS. If the debate has been concluded——

Mr. JOHNSON. The debate has been concluded, and I will ask the Senator if he will not permit the matter to be submitted to the Senate now?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I must object. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADMIRAL SIMS'S STATEMENT AND AMBASSADOR HARVEY'S ADDRESS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the morning Washington Post, on the front page, carries an article headed "'Misquoted,' Sims cables to Denby." I will read the article so it may appear in the RECORD. It is by the Associated Press, as follows:

Remarks attributed to him in press reports of his recent address before the English Speaking Union in London, in which he criticized activities of Sinn Fein sympathizers in this country, were not correctly quoted and were misleading, Admiral William S. Sims declared in a cablegram received yesterday by Secretary Denby.

I now quote from the message of Admiral Sims to Secretary Denby:

"Statements that were attributed to me," said the message, "were not correctly quoted. Context misleading and garbled. Report of statements is incorrect and inferentially wrong. Statement actually made was substantially the same as repeatedly made in public in America and in my book 'The Victory at Sea,' and in public address at meeting held for increasing good relations between the English-speaking people."

Mr. President, the report that is stated by Admiral Sims in this message to Secretary of the Navy Denby to have misquoted him was carried by all the news services of the country and is already incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I shall not read, but ask that as a part of my remarks may be included the report of certain London papers the morning following the speech of Admiral Sims showing what the representatives of their press thought Admiral Sims said at that time. I think that this is in fairness to the news service and the newspapers of the country that have carried the dispatch from London which Admiral Sims says was garbled and in which he says he is misquoted. It is fair to Admiral Sims also.

I first desire to have incorporated in the RECORD, and it is not very long, what the Daily Telegraph of London reported that the admiral said on that occasion. Then I desire to have incorporated also what the Morning Post, an English paper, said, and also what was stated in the London Times, which, in my opinion, goes to show that the reports that were published by the news services in this country were about the same as carried in the London press of that date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Special cable to the Washington Post.]

LONDON, June 12.

The day after Admiral Sims's speech before the English Speaking Union the Daily Telegraph reported him as follows:

"It had been found necessary on the other side to form as quickly as possible certain associations in order to counteract the very dangerous propaganda by enemies of the two countries. False news was being put on the wires on both sides, and that was the sort of thing they were trying to counteract.

"He has been abused for certain articles he had published in which he told the simple truth about the actions of the Sinn Fein faction in reference to troops during the war. Owing to the action of these people forces had to be diverted from their legitimate purpose of escorting American troops and American ships, and that had caused a great many ships to be sunk and a great many lives to be lost.

STATEMENT OFTEN MADE.

"He had made that statement wherever meetings had been called to counteract propaganda and he intended to keep on making it. He had never hesitated to say that some Americans and Sinn Fein sympathizers in America had the blood of English and American boys on their hands. These people were Americans when they needed money, but Sinn Feiners when they were on the platform. They were like the zebra—they were either white horses with black stripes or black horses with white stripes. Really he strongly suspected that they were asses. Each one of these asses had a vote and it was one of the inconveniences of a Republic that American-born citizens found it necessary to cater for those votes.

"This created a wrong impression on this side, but now the people of Great Britain would know how much confidence to place in an Irish resolution which was forced by these jackass votes." [Laughter and cheers.]

On Wednesday the Morning Post discussed the speech of Admiral Sims in detail. Regarding the part of his speech which Admiral Sims cabled Secretary Denby had been garbled, the Post said:

"It was their (i. e., the Pilgrims) business to counteract the dangerous influences of those who were the enemies of both countries and to bring out the truth about and between them.

"In the press of America, generally, the wrong side was represented and the right side was not represented.

"In order to rectify this and to counteract the dangerous propaganda to which he alluded, further organizations, he said, were being suggested, and this action involved a certain amount of unpopularity for some people in high position on the other side.

MISREPRESENTATION ALLEGED.

"He (Admiral Sims) had been greatly misrepresented when it was alleged that he was opposed to everything Irish and to the whole Irish nation in an article which he had written. He told the people of America facts with regard to action of the Sinn Fein against them and their troops during the war, and how a great many lives and ships were lost on this account through forces being diverted from escorting merchant ships and other important services.

"The same influences," he said, "were at work to-day, carrying on a war against both America and this country and trying to sap the good relations between the two nations which had been established while they were cooperating at sea.

"The sympathizers with Sinn Fein in America," he said, "had the blood of both British and American boys on their hands. They were Americans when they wanted money, but they were Sinn Feiners when they were on the platform. They were like the zebra, which was described by some as a white horse with black stripes and by others as a black horse with white stripes. In America they knew that these were not horses at all. He strongly suspected that they were asses, but each of those asses had votes, and there were a lot of them. It was necessary that their influence for harm should be counteracted."

The News and the Chronicle did not report the speech, and the Daily Mail and the Daily Express printed very brief reports.

LONDON TIMES VERSION.

The London Times, in reporting the speech of Admiral Sims, said, in part:

"His enemies said he opposed the whole Irish nation. He was not going to speak of the Irish question, for it was partly on an American question, but he had written certain articles in which he told the truth about the action of the Sinn Fein faction in reference of our troops during the war. They had not had the material to attack directly, so they had done so indirectly. Forces had had to be diverted to deal with them, with the result that a great many ships and a great many lives had been lost.

"He intended to continue to make that statement," he said. "They had people on the other side, technically American citizens, who were carrying on war to-day against America and against Great Britain and were trying to destroy the good relations between the two countries.

"To those with Sinn Fein sympathies in America, he said that the simple truth of the wretched business was that there was the blood of English and American boys on their hands.

"They were Americans," he said, "when they wanted money, but they were Sinn Feiners on the platform. They were like a zebra, either a black horse with white stripes or a white horse with black stripes. He suspected that they were not horses, but asses. But these asses had votes, and there were a lot of them.

"The consequence was that American-born citizens found it necessary to cater for those votes. This was one of the inconveniences of the Republic which created a wrong impression on this side.

"Those who understood the situation, however," he said, "knew how much importance to attach to resolutions in favor of the Irish which were forced by those jackass votes."

Mr. HARRISON. Since this remarkable speech was made by Admiral Sims last Tuesday night and the inquiry went forth from the Secretary of the Navy for a report as to the correctness of what he said on that occasion, and no report had come in answer to that request from the Secretary, the Secretary took very appropriate action on Saturday by sending this cablegram to Admiral Sims:

Remainder of your leave is revoked. You will return to the United States immediately and report at once in person to the Secretary of the Navy. Acknowledge.

So this matter will be heard by the Secretary of the Navy on the return to this country of Admiral Sims, and will also be investigated under a mandate of the Senate by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did Admiral Sims reply to the first cablegram of the Secretary of the Navy before he got the second cablegram directing that he should come home? Can the Senator tell us about that?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, all I know is what I have seen in the press. I understand that the cablegram from the Secretary of the Navy which I have just quoted, revoking the leave of absence granted Admiral Sims and directing him to return immediately and report to the Secretary of the Navy, was sent and was probably received by the admiral, although I am not sure about that, before Admiral Sims made the reply carried in the morning press. All the statements I have seen since Secretary Denby first cabled to Admiral Sims were to the effect that he would leave on a certain boat on Wednesday next, according to his plans; he did not seem to show any haste in answering the summons.

Mr. President, there has been a great furore about the so-called "jackass speech" of Admiral Sims. The impression seems to be universal throughout the country that it was in bad taste; that it was intemperate and was most indiscreet for one occupying the high official position as head of the Navy War College and of naval operations in European waters during the recent war to have discussed a delicate political question in London on that occasion.

It has been called to the attention of the Senate before that there was another remarkable speech made on the 19th of May last by another higher in authority than Admiral Sims, by one who is closer to the President of the United States than any one in official life, except, perhaps, one or two Cabinet officers and one or two distinguished Senators here. He was very close to the President in the late campaign, has been close to him since; they were in constant communication and conference before Col. Harvey was appointed ambassador and left for London. So the importance of the speech that was made at the Pilgrims' banquet on May 19 by Col. Harvey can not be discounted.

The country accepted it as the views of the administration not only touching our entry into the League of Nations but as to other expressions therein. Some went so far as to intimate and, indeed, to state that the speech evidently had been read by those high in authority in this country before the departure of the new ambassador for London. Whether or not that is true, of course, none of us knows except the President himself or the Secretary of State. Those statements, however, have never been denied by the President, the Secretary of State, or by anyone who is high in authority. There has been no protest, so far as we know, on the part of anyone who is high in the official kingdom of the present administration to this remarkable speech of May 19.

I read with a great deal of interest on yesterday an article which was published in the New York Times. It is a well-written letter by one Frederick Lynch to the editor of the Times. I am not going to read all of the letter, but I ask consent to have it incorporated in full in the RECORD in the course of my remarks. I shall read only a part of the letter, if my request is granted, and I imagine no one will object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. HARRISON. This letter written by Mr. Lynch is remarkable for three reasons. The first is that Mr. Lynch, as I understand, is a Methodist preacher of splendid character and great reputation; secondly, that he is or was a Republican; and, thirdly, because he was present at the Pilgrims' banquet when the speech was made by Col. Harvey. In this letter he expresses the impression which was made on his mind and on the minds of the other banqueters at the time; how it shamed him, and how badly he felt at hearing such expressions touching the motives and purposes for our entrance into the war by the representative of the United States in the highest diplomatic position of our country; aye, beyond that, from one who had been designated as the personal representative of the President of the United States on the supreme council. Occupying that high position, it is no wonder Mr. Lynch was humiliated when the words fell from the lips of a supposed representative American that we went into war not for the high ideals that we had previously indorsed, but because we were afraid not to fight, and so forth. I shall now read a part of this letter. I am sorry there are not more Republicans on the other side of the Chamber to hear it, because this is a Republican speaking to Republicans as well as to Americans everywhere. Mr. Lynch says:

> A month has now passed since Mr. Harvey made his famous first speech in London as the American ambassador to the Court of St. James. Had it been Mr. Harvey speaking simply as a private citizen, his famous three points would not have caused the commotion that they have in Europe; but he spoke officially, as the ambassador of the United States, sent to England to speak for the Nation. Indeed, our ambassador is generally supposed to have consulted his President or the King before speaking anything in public.
> Mr. Harvey, at the now famous dinner given him upon his arrival in London, made three points, and made them very emphatically, both in words and manner. I happened to hear the speech, and he spoke as a man who was going to leave no doubt in anybody's mind as to just how he and his Government felt upon the matter. These three points were (1) that the United States entered the war actuated by motives of self-interest purely and simply, having no thought whatever of saving Belgium or France, but of saving herself alone.
>
> No one who was not present at the dinner can have any idea of the consternation each one of these statements produced as they followed one upon the other. As a matter of fact, they so stunned the 500 persons who heard them that they did not quite grasp the significance of them. It was not until the next morning, when the people of Europe read the words in cold type, that the significance came over them. Ever since then the British, French, Belgian, and German papers have been asking: "Did Mr. Harvey really represent the mind and feeling of the American people? Did the Americans enter the war actuated by selfish motives only? Was Mr. Harvey right in throwing scorn upon American idealism, as he did, all through his speech? Is it true that the majority for Mr. Harding was a mandate against the League of Nations? Do the American people want to have nothing to do with the League of Nations and have no part in the new world order?" These are the questions all the journals of Europe—of the world, for that matter—have been asking for the last month. Is it not time that we, the American people, ask ourselves the same questions, and see if, upon sober second thought, we really agree with Mr. Harvey and are going to say to the world, "Yes; he spoke the mind of the American people"?
> Mr. Harvey's first point, to quote his own words, was as follows: "Far more prevalent until recently was the impression—and this was, and still is in a measure, sincere—that we went into the war to rescue humanity from all kinds of menacing perils. Not a few remain convinced that we sent our young soldiers across the sea to save this Kingdom and France and Italy. That is not the fact. We sent them solely to save the United States of America, and most reluctantly and laggardly at that."
>
> As I said above, no one who was not present can imagine the consternation with which these words were heard. It must be remembered, in the first place, that England did not go into the war to save England, and if one suggests that even to-day in England he is in danger of being knocked down by the nearest Englishman.
>
> The only man that ever dared say of England what Mr. Harvey says of America is Mr. Bernard Shaw, and everybody will remember with what a howl of derision and storm of scorn Mr. Shaw's naive pamphlet was received. (All readers of Mr. Shaw know that his general attitude toward life is that of the cynic.) The English people, unless they are a nest of hypocrites, did not go into the war to save England. Furthermore, I have never met an Englishman or Frenchman who believed the United States entered the war solely to save herself. I was interested in the murmur of "nays" that I heard about me on the night of May 19, when Mr. Harvey said we did. But the question now is, "Do we Americans stand by Mr. Harvey's asseveration and in chorus say to Europe what he said as our representative?" If we do, let us say so, for the sake of the estimate the world has for us. England and France and Belgium unanimously believe we acted with unselfish motive, urged on by a zeal for righteousness and a desire to avenge the oppressed and to save the world from Prussian domination. Germany did not believe it, and openly called us hypocrites for saying so. Let us say openly and frankly which is right.
> I may, of course, have very limited experience of men, may have touched only select men; but of the hundreds with whom I have come in contact all entered or supported the war not to save the United States but to make a great sacrifice for righteousness. My experience may have been different from that of others, for I was won to the support of the war from a final conviction that it was a war for the saving of the world from the rule of force—what is generally designated as Prussianism. All my friends professed to have been led to its support on the same high, idealistic ground.
> * * * * * * *

Mr. President, that was the impression made upon this good Republican Methodist preacher at the banquet on the night that the words were spoken by our representative in London.

I ask that the entire letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The letter in full is as follows:

COL. HARVEY'S AUDIENCE.

(By Frederick Lynch.)

LONDON, May 2½, 1921.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

A month has now passed since Mr. Harvey made his famous first speech in London as the American ambassador to the Court of St. James. Had it been Mr. Harvey speaking simply as a private citizen, his famous three points would not have caused the commotion that they have in Europe; but he spoke officially as the ambassador of the United States sent to England to speak for the Nation. Indeed, our ambassador is generally supposed to have consulted his President or the King before speaking anything in public.

Mr. Harvey at the now famous dinner given him upon his arrival in London made three points, and made them very emphatically, both in words and manner. I happened to hear the speech, and he spoke as a man who was going to leave no doubt in anybody's mind as to just how he and his Government felt upon the matter. These three points were (1) that the United States entered the war actuated by motives of self-interest purely and simply, having no thought whatever of saving Belgium or France, but of saving herself alone; (2) that the great Republican majority was a protest against the League of Nations, a "mandate" not to have anything to do with it; (3) that the United States did not intend to have anything to do with the League of Nations nor with any of its committees, either formally or informally.

No one who was not present at the dinner can have any idea of the consternation each one of these statements produced as they followed one upon the other. As a matter of fact, they so stunned the 500 persons who heard them that they did not quite grasp the significance of them. It was not until the next morning, when the people of Europe read the words in cold type, that the significance came over them. Ever since then the British, French, Belgian, and German papers have been asking: "Did Mr. Harvey really represent the mind and feeling of the American people? Did the Americans enter the war actuated by selfish motives only? Was Mr. Harvey right in throwing scorn upon American idealism, as he did, all through his speech? Is it true that the majority for Mr. Harding was a mandate against the League of Nations? Do the American people want to have nothing to do with the League of Nations and have no part in the new world order?" These are the questions all the journals of Europe—of the world, for that matter—have been asking for the last month. Is it not time that we, the American people, ask ourselves the same questions and see if, upon sober second thought, we really agree with Mr. Harvey and are going to say to the world: "Yes; he spoke the mind of the American people"?

Mr. Harvey's first point—to quote his own words—was as follows: "Far more prevalent until recently was the impression—and this was, and still is, in a measure sincere—that we went into the war to rescue humanity from all kinds of menacing perils. Not a few remain convinced that we sent our young soldiers across the sea to save this Kingdom and France and Italy. That is not the fact. We sent them solely to save the United States of America, and most reluctantly and laggardly at that."

As I said above, no one who was not present can imagine the consternation with which these words were heard. It must be remembered, in the first place, that England did not go into the war to save England; and if one suggests that even to-day in England he is in danger of being knocked down by the nearest Englishman. I happened to be in the House of Commons the first week of August, 1914, on the night when England voted to enter the war. I heard the great four hours' debate. Not a soul from Grey down mentioned England's taking the step that was to cost her such agony to save England. It was to save Belgium, to maintain the honor of the plighted troth, to indicate righteousness in international relationships, to save Europe from the inevitable triumph of the gospel that might makes right should the aggressor triumph. The president of a great university in Scotland is reported to have said that practically every student came to him in the first month of the war to volunteer, and that they did not talk about fighting for "King and country" at all, but they all, without exception, offered their lives to save Belgium and vindicate honor. They were filled with a holy rage against what was going on in Europe.

The only man that ever dared say of England what Mr. Harvey says of America is Mr. Bernard Shaw, and everybody will remember with what a howl of derision and storm of scorn Mr. Shaw's naive pamphlet was received. (All readers of Mr. Shaw know that his general attitude toward life is that of the cynic.) The English people, unless they are a nest of hypocrites, did not go into the war to save England. Furthermore, I have never met an Englishman or Frenchman who believed the United States entered the war solely to save herself. I was interested in the murmur of "nays" that I heard about me on the night of May 19 when Mr. Harvey said we did. But the question now is, "Do we Americans stand by Mr. Harvey's asseveration and in chorus say to Europe what he said as our representative?" If we do, let us say so, for the sake of the estimate the world has for us. England and France and Belgium unanimously believed we acted with unselfish motive, urged on by a zeal for righteousness and a desire to avenge the oppressed and to save the world from Prussian domination. Germany did not believe it, and openly called us hypocrites for saying so. Let us say openly and frankly which is right.

I may, of course, have very limited experience of men, may have touched only select men; but, of the hundreds with whom I have come in contact, all entered or supported the war not to save the United States but to make a great sacrifice for righteousness. My experience may have been different from that of others, for I was won to the support of the war from a final conviction that it was a war for the saving of the world from the rule of force—what is generally designated as Prussianism. All my friends professed to have been led to its support on the same high, idealistic ground.

The second utterance of Mr. Harvey that the American people should either justify or contradict, for the sake of the world, was this: "As you know, the question of America's participation in the league came before the people, and the people decided against it by a majority of 7,000,000 out of 25,000,000. A majority of 7,000,000 clearly conveyed a mandate that could be neither misunderstood nor disregarded." Here again the audience at the dinner was nonplused. The English people had never dreamed that the great vote for Mr. Harding was a mandate against the League of Nations. They had been told by the American papers that it was not. They had read about thousands of proleague Republicans. Prominent Americans had just been saying in London before Mr. Harvey came that it was not, and that thousands and thousands of those who voted for Mr. Harding believed in the league. But Mr. Harvey told them no—the vote was a mandate—one the President could not disregard "without betrayal of its creators and masters." Did Mr. Harvey tell the truth or did he misrepresent us to the world? One should answer this, because all Europe has been greatly surprised at the statement. Personally I thought otherwise. I had hundreds of Republican friends, who had been ardent proleaguers, who told me they were going to vote for him as the surest way of getting in. Many of these friends signed a statement to this effect—a statement that went all over the Nation and was favorably sustained, to judge by Republican journals, by thousands of Republicans. I happen to be a member of the executive committee of the League to Enforce Peace. It is made up of those who believe in the League of Nations. Indeed, they had much to do with shaping the present covenant—Mr. Taft, Mr. Straus, President Lowell—many more, all good Republicans. They clung to the league to the end, are still in the organization, but voted the Republican ticket. Certain organizations interested in the league polled the churches not long before the election. The votes in favor of the United States entering the league were so unanimous that the votes against were not worth considering; but from all I can learn about four out of five of these clergymen voted for Mr. Harding.

Finally, Mr. Harvey said, with great emphasis, that the United States would have nothing whatever to do with the League of Nations or anything connected with it. Let me quote his now familiar words, words that have probably been read by everybody in the world who reads: "There still seems to linger in the minds of many here, as, indeed, of a few at home, an impression that in some way or other, by hook or by crook, unwittingly and surely unwillingly, the United States may yet be beguiled into the League of Nations. Now, let me show you how utterly absurd any such notion is." (He then refers to the "mandate" of 7,000,000 majority against entering the league.) "It follows, then, inevitably and irresistibly, that our present Government could not, without betrayal of its creators and masters, and will not, I can assure you, have anything whatsoever to do with the league or with any commission or committee appointed by it or responsible to it, directly or indirectly, openly or furtively."

If the two first declarations fell upon the audience like clubs, this one fell like a thunderbolt. There was simply dead silence. It was so contrary to that which everyone was expecting. Mr. Harding had said certain things before his election that had awakened hope that in some way the United States would participate in the new world order. Mr. Fred B. Smith and others had been saying the same thing in London. Mr. Lloyd-George had seemingly taken for granted that the slow but final consent of the United States to participate with the supreme council in settling the war questions meant that she would join in establishing the new order of peace, in the establishing of the international court, the reduction of disarmaments, the dissipation of the old feuds of the world. His address of welcome to Mr. Harvey dwelt upon three things; and then came Mr. Harvey's slashing ultimatum that the United States would not associate itself with the other nations of the world in accomplishing any of these things. Lloyd-George's great appeal was a noble appeal for disinterested service to the world. Mr. Harvey's whole speech gave the impression that America would be actuated by self-interest alone. He seemed to take particular pains to make this plain. The impression everyone got was that she was joining the supreme council simply to protect her own interests. Anyhow, the statement about the league was given with all the finality of the last judgment, and was accepted as such by everyone with whom I spoke in Europe.

The question I would like to raise is this: Do the people of the United States accept it as final and stand by Mr. Harvey in this statement? (Of course, he would not have made it except on President Harding's authority, so that it is accepted in all the world as the final word by the administration.) Is it the word of the American people to the world? Perhaps I was mistaken in believing in the idealism of the American people. Perhaps they never did have any desire to serve humanity. Perhaps they are concerned in self-interest only. Perhaps they have no interest in world problems. Perhaps those Americans who have been so interested in world courts, international arbitrations, Hague conferences, disarmament, cooperative nationalism, world conference, or world problems, a Christian world order, do not represent the American people. I thought they did, but if Mr. Harvey speaks for us they did not.

Let us answer the question; but before doing so, let us realize just what it means. All the world, excepting the United States and Germany (which will soon be in the league), is in an association of nations whose primary function is to deal with the great problems and principles just mentioned. The day after Mr. Harvey's speech Lord Robert Cecil, who is not only a member of the league assembly but is acknowledged to be among the three or four greatest British statesmen, moved by Mr. Harvey's remarks, wrote a letter to the London Times to the effect that the British people must support the league more heartily than ever, now that America had definitely refused to have any part in it, because it was the only thing that would save the world from future wars and destruction.

FREDERICK LYNCH.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Some days ago I pointed out the very great difference between the recent views expressed by the President and those expressed by Mr. Harvey, but in justice to everybody it may be recalled that in the Senate on June 8, 1917, then Senator Harding among other things, speaking of a speech delivered by President Wilson a short time previously, had this to say on this very interesting subject:

> In that speech the President said that we were not in war because of any particular grievance of our own. In another speech the President has said, and beautifully said, that we want to make the world safe for democracy. I subscribe to that sentiment, Senators, but I want to say to you men who are responsible for government in these trying times that you can not justify this war and you can not unify the American people in the defense of the American Nation except on the justifiable ground of defending and preserving American national rights. If I were in any place other than the Senate Chamber of the United States, where one might speak with a little more freedom than the courtesies of this body require to be observed, I would say that much of the sentiment uttered concerning our part in the war is balderdash.
> I delight in these collateral issues involved. I believe in democracy just as much as any man on this floor. I can find my heart thrilled with the thought of this great Nation taking its part in the maintenance of human liberties and the safety of the liberty of the world, and I am not a little impressed by the part of this great Republic in making sure the guaranties of the best civilization the world has ever known. But nations called upon to fight must have a more defensible reason than even these ideals; and the one defensible reason for the United States of America, back of which every Senator can array himself and back of which every American citizen can and will array himself, no matter whence he comes, is the defense of American national rights, the safety of American lives, the maintenance of American honor, and our freedom to participate in the commerce of the seas.

I call the Senator's attention to this for the purpose of showing that in 1917 the views of President Harding were substantially the same as those expressed by Mr. Harvey in his Pilgrims' banquet speech. I, for one, am delighted that that President has changed those views and has now adopted, at least in the public prints, the views from which I quoted in a speech I made in this body not long ago.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has correctly quoted from the speech of President Harding, but the President never in any utterance that he ever made went so far as to say that "we were afraid not to fight," that that was the reason we entered the war; whereas the explanation that our new ambassador to the Court of St. James has given to the world and to history as to our reasons for entering the war is that "we were afraid not to fight."

Of course, I am surprised that he should make such a statement as that. I should be surprised at any American saying that we went into this war because we were afraid not to fight; but, as has already been included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it would come with much better grace and more appropriately from this gentleman who now represents our country at the Court of St. James than from any other American, because in a speech that he made in Charleston, S. C., to the St. Andrew's Society on November 30, 1904, this same gentleman, in discussing the Civil War and the part that he and his family played at that time, gave voice to somewhat similar utterances.

Let me read this, so that those who may scan the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may know what 18 years ago this same individual said about those of his family when the War between the States broke out—that this man, who now says that our boys were fighting because "we were afraid not to fight," once uttered like sentiments touching members of his family in the War between the States.

I quote from him. He says, in this speech away back in 1904:

> The first of my ancestors to arrive in this country landed in Massachusetts in the seventeenth century. The last of my ancestors born in another country came from Scotland in the nineteenth century. My two grandfathers hewed out their homes in the wilderness of Vermont nearly a hundred years ago. In those days the least of evils to be apprehended was race suicide, and many were the sons and grandsons to whom fell the duty and the honor of sustaining the beliefs and maintaining the traditions of those earnest men.
> * * * * * * *
> At the outbreak of the Civil War—

Said Col. George Harvey, and he never got that title by any service in any real war—

> At the outbreak of the Civil War, of my immediate ancestors living, were two grandfathers, my own father, and nine uncles. They were northern men. Not one of them had ever crossed the Mason and Dixon line. They regarded any form of slavery with abhorrence, but not one of those 12 men ever lifted a hand against his white brother in the South. From their meager store and from necessity 11 of them furnished the Federal Government with the sums of money fixed for the procurement of substitutes. One uncle, perhaps the best able of the 12 to do so, absolutely refused and chewed the cud of bitter reflection for nearly two years in the county jail. I make no boast of their action. I claim for them no credit. Whether at that time, under those circumstances, I should have done as they did I do not know, but the facts are family history and constitute the basis of my assertion that I have an absolute and unqualified right to speak to you men of the South the words of a fraternal heart.

I commend that part of his speech to the valiant men who fought in this late war when they read the speech of Ambassador Harvey on May 19 at the Court of St. James, when he said that they went to war because "we were afraid not to fight"! They will understand, then, that Ambassador Harvey is alone in that belief.

So, Mr. President, as intemperate, as indefensible, as inappropriate as was the speech of Admiral Sims on last Tuesday night in London, attempting to voice the sentiment of the American people because he was at the head of the American Navy abroad, it is not nearly as reprehensible, in my opinion, as the vile slander, as the base insult expressed by Ambassador Harvey on May 19 against all of those who had a part, it matters not how small it was, in the late Great War.

I know it is not true that America went to war because she "was afraid not to fight."

I can not believe that Pershing's actions abroad in laying his plans that brought luster and honor and glory to our flag were because he "was afraid not to fight."

I can not believe that the millions of boys throughout the country, from hamlets and cities and rural sections, volunteered their services in this war because they "were afraid not to fight."

I can not believe that the hundreds of thousands of brave young men who enlisted in the American Navy and plied the waters, undergoing every kind of danger, night and day, remaining on deck, any moment being subject to attack by submarines, joined the Navy because they "were afraid not to fight."

I can not believe that the thousands on thousands of brave lads in the marines, in the Army, as they sat up night after night in the trenches in France and Belgium, waiting to charge or repulse the attacks of German armies, went to war because they "were afraid not to fight."

I can not believe that the spirit of the men—the marines—who won such glory at Belleau Wood, was prompted by the thought that they "were afraid not to fight."

I can not believe that those gallant and splendid and brave engineers of the Army, as they withstood the assaults of the German forces at Chateau Thierry, were prompted by the belief that they were fighting because they "were afraid not to fight."

I can not believe that Sergt. Alvin C. York, one of the greatest heroes of the war, whose name will be emblazoned on the pages of American history throughout time, was prompted in rendering such gallant service by the thought that "he was afraid not to fight." I do not believe it, even though the personal representative of President Harding in the most important position now to which a man could be appointed said that we went into the war because "we were afraid not to fight." I do not believe and will not believe that makes it true.

I do not believe that Col. Whittlesey and the courageous young men who were with him and under his command in that sector at Argonne Forest, penned in for three days, I believe, without food and without water, who, when the truce was handed to him and he was asked to surrender, told the Germans to "go to hell," was prompted by the spirit that "we were afraid not to fight."

I do not believe—and I know that you Senators over there agree with me—that Quentin Roosevelt, splendid, sturdy, brave young fellow that he was, the son of a gallant soldier, a great statesman, and a distinguished man in the Republican Party, who gave up his life as an aviator in the cause of his country, and whose remains lie buried now somewhere in France, went into the war and gave his life in the cause prompted by the spirit that he "was afraid not to fight."

This statement of Ambassador Harvey is an insult to every soldier and sailor and marine who helped to win this war. There is not a mother's son of them who was prompted by the thought that they "were afraid not to fight" when he went into this war and blazoned in letters of gold glory for the Stars and Stripes. There was not a mother in this land, nor a woman who went across or stayed here and contributed her mite to win it and sustain the boys, who thought it was a war that was being fought because "we were afraid not to fight." There is not a man in this country, I care not how poor and humble he may be, who bought a Liberty bond or did the minutest thing to win the war, who believed that we were fighting simply because "we were afraid not to fight."

And so, speaking, as he is, as the high representative of a great and powerful Government, closer to the President than anyone else, history will be written and critics of this war will point to it throughout time that the personal representative of the President said that it was a war which the United States entered because "we were afraid not to fight."

The pages of American history should be made pure; they should reveal the truth; and I know no better way in which to do it than by a resolution which I am going to present and ask for its immediate consideration to see that the facts are given to the American people that this foul stain be wiped out. If he has been wrongly quoted, then history should show it. If he has been correctly quoted, he deserves not only a reprimand but a recall from the high position to which he has been appointed.

Oh, yes; Sims should receive the criticism that is being poured on him. Investigation should be made. The Secretary of the Navy has acted right in his case; but I see no justice in the proposition that because he slandered a part of the American people and is to be punished, and drastic and immediate action is being taken against him, one higher up, who is guilty of a more atrocious offense than Sims, whose remarks are more intemperate, inexcusable, and unjustifiable than Sims's, should remain at his post of duty and continue to voice what he claims to be the sentiment of the American people.

I have waited, and patiently waited, and Americans everywhere have done so, for some voice in authority to be lifted in protest against this speech that was an insult to those who voted for the war and to those who helped to win the war, but not one word publicly has been said by President Harding since May 19 by way of calling Harvey to account for that speech. Nothing has crept into the public print emanating from the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, protesting against that utterance. I can not believe that they approve of it. What I want to know is whether or not he truly voiced the sentiment of the present administration when he expressed that vile slander against the Government when he said that we went to war because "we were afraid not to fight."

So, Mr. President, if action is taken against Sims, as it should be, then more prompt and more vigorous action should be taken against Ambassador Harvey.

It may be true, and I hope it is, that his making of that speech on May 19 so aroused President Harding and Secretary Hughes that they cabled to him and asked him if he had made those remarks. It may be that they reprimanded him severely, and have protested. But we are in the dark about it; the country is in the dark about it. History will not reveal those facts, unless we take some action.

So I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that the pending bill may be laid aside temporarily for the purpose of the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. President, I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 91), as follows:

> Whereas Admiral William S. Sims on the 7th day of June, 1921, in an address to the English Speaking Union at a dinner in the city of London, is reported to have employed the following language:
> "There are many in our country who technically are Americans, naturalized and born there, but none of them Americans at all. They are Americans when they want money, but Sinn Feiners on the platform. They are making war on America to-day. The simple truth of it is that they have the blood of English and American boys on their hands. They are like zebras, either black horses with white stripes or white horses with black stripes. But we know they are not horses; they are asses. But each of these asses has a vote, and there are lots of them"; and

Whereas within a very few hours the Secretary of the Navy, by cable, requested an explanation of the speech and, failing to receive within a reasonable time a reply to the request, the admiral's leave of absence was peremptorily canceled by the Secretary of the Navy and he was ordered to return to Washington and report personally to the Secretary of the Navy; and

Whereas the Hon. George Harvey, the ambassador representing the United States at the Court of St. James, on May 19, 1921, in a speech at the Pilgrims' dinner in the city of London, employed the following language:

"Even to this day at rare intervals an ebullient sophomore seeks applause and wins a smile by shouting that 'we won the war!' Far more prevalent until recently was the impression—and this was and still is in a measure sincere—that we went into the war to rescue humanity from all kinds of menacing perils.

"Not a few remain convinced that we sent our young soldiers across the sea to save this Kingdom and France and Italy. This is not the fact. We sent them solely to save the United States of America, and most reluctantly and laggardly at that.

"We were not too proud to fight—whatever that may mean. We were afraid not to fight. That is the real truth of the matter, and so we came along toward the end and helped you and your allies to shorten the war. That is all we did and all we claim to have done"; and

Whereas the remarks of Ambassador George Harvey, touching the reasons for our entry into the war do not represent the views of the American people and were most reprehensible, and the provocation for reprimand or his recall is as great, if not greater, than that for the recall of Admiral Sims: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States respectfully request the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to Congress:

First. Whether he was consulted or knew of the purported speech of Ambassador George Harvey, made at the Pilgrims' Day dinner on May 19, 1921, before it was made.

Second. Whether he or, through his direction, the Secretary of State has protested or reprimanded Ambassador George Harvey for making the said speech or employing such language in said speech, or whether he or the Secretary of State have undertaken to ascertain whether the ambassador was correctly quoted in his speech as carried in the American newspapers.

Third. Whether in the opinion of the President there is as much reason and justification for a reprimand or the recall of Ambassador George Harvey for his Pilgrims' Day speech of May 19, 1921, as for the reprimand or recall of Admiral William S. Sims for his speech of June 7, 1921.

Fourth. And whether the order of the Secretary of the Navy Denby as follows:

"Remainder of your leave is revoked. You will return to the United States immediately and report at once in person to the Secretary of the Navy. Acknowledge," was issued at the direction or approval of the President, and why an order by the President or Secretary of State of similar import is not issued against Ambassador George Harvey.

Fifth. Whether the Secretary of State or the President has received any communications from Ambassador George Harvey to any request or protest from either the President or Secretary of State, and if any have been received, for the President to transmit them to the Senate, if in his possession, or the Secretary of State, if in his possession.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that carries with it an objection?

Mr. CURTIS. It carries the resolution over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I stated before, it had not been my intention to debate the pending bill, because I felt that it was in reality the same measure which the Senate passed a short time ago after very full debate. But it seems that the idea of the Committee on Agriculture, that the Senate would not care to go into a lengthy consideration of this subject again, was erroneous. It appears from what has been said and the arguments that have been made against the bill so far that there is a determination to debate it.

When the committee came into the Senate with this bill, believing it would not bring about much debate because of the very slight changes which were made in the bill, they did not refrain from debating it through any fear of what the necessities of the case demanded in legislation, but they did it to a great extent out of respect for the Senate, thinking that it would be almost an imposition to go over all the ground again, and we are confronted at the threshold by those who oppose the Senate committee bill with criticism because we did not have more hearings. After we had had hearings so long that it had worn out all the members of the committee, we are censured now on the floor of the Senate because we did not have more hearings. That is only one of the methods, Mr. President, that is resorted to to defeat legislation on this subject.

Without ascribing it to any Member of the Senate, I say that the packers will be able to start in now with hearings and hold them for the next 10 years without any let up, and if we had listened to their requests and gone into it again, we would have spent another two years conducting hearings, going over the same ground again.

Many of the essential terms of the two bills are the same, and in an attempt to get the Senate to vote for the bill as it passed the House many of the terms of the Senate committee bill are condemned, many of the terms which are being condemned being also in the House bill. So that we are being harangued about things that are in the Senate committee bill which are said to be wrong and vicious, many of which are likewise in the bill as it passed the House, for which you are expected to vote.

All the influences that can be brought to bear by the great corporations engaged in the packing business are now being brought to bear to secure, if possible, the adoption by the Senate of the bill as it passed the House. Do not let anybody misunderstand the issue. If the packers are to have their way in the vote that must come in this Chamber, then we will vote down the Senate committee substitute. Vote against the committee amendment if you want to please the packers. It might be right to do that. I am only offering that as a suggestion for light, as to where the parties interested in this legislation are lining up. I may be entirely wrong; the committee may be wrong. The packers may be entirely right, and I am not finding fault with the man who believes that. I can only say that after these years of investigation I do not believe it will do any good to strike the packers across the back with a feather.

Let me take up some of the provisions in the Senate committee bill which are assailed; and I would like to say, Mr. President, as I have said before, that the Senate committee bill is not the outgrowth of any one particular man's ideas. There are some things in it I do not like, and I shall frankly tell the Senate about them when we reach them. I expect myself to offer an amendment that was defeated in the Committee on Agriculture while the bill was still there.

One of the issues that is here at stake is the life of the Federal Trade Commission. I realize that some Senators, and many other people, would be glad to wipe the Federal Trade Commission off the map, and they have the right to that opinion if they believe that. I am not impunging the motives of the man who believes it. But I want to say that neither bill is satisfactory, in my judgment, on that proposition, and those of you who believe that the Federal Trade Commission is doing a great work for our people and our country, and want to retain it, with all its jurisdiction and all its powers, will have to amend whichever bill passes.

The House bill, in my humble judgment, is much worse on that subject than the Senate committee bill. It repeals the Federal Trade Commission authority to do anything with these packers. As far as the packing and allied industries are concerned, the House bill repeals the law. I want to read what it says, and then I will take up what the Senate committee bill says.

Paragraph (b), section 406, of the bill as it passed the House reads as follows:

(b) On and after the enactment of this act, and so long as it remains in effect, the Federal Trade Commission shall have no power or jurisdiction so far as relating to any matter which by this act is made subject to the jurisdiction of the Secretary, except in cases in which, before the enactment of this act, complaint has been served under section 5 of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, or under section 11 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

So, for all practical purposes, excepting only pending cases, the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission is entirely taken away. In the bill reported by the Senate committee it is section 5 that limits. Section 5, after giving certain powers to the courts, the same as the Federal Trade Commission act gives them, which in reality is only surplusage, because the same thing is given in other parts of the bill, winds up by saying:

Upon the taking effect of this act the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission, in so far as it relates to live stock and live-stock products in domestic commerce, shall be terminated, except in such cases where the Federal Trade Commission is directed to make an investigation by the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, or either branch of Congress.

As between the two provisions, I very much prefer the Senate committee provision. It still leaves the Federal Trade Commission subject to be required at a moment's notice to act when asked by the Senate alone, by the House alone, by the Secretary of Agriculture alone, or by the President alone. In my judgment, that authority in the law would have a great effect upon any commissioner who might get the office and who was not in sympathy with the act or who was friendly to the packers, and that condition might come. It was said last Friday on the floor of the Senate that sooner or later the commissioner provided for in the Senate bill would be controlled by the packers. That may be. It might also be said of the Secretary of Agriculture.

It might also be said of the Federal Trade Commission, but it will be several years before the Federal Trade Commission can be thus controlled, and it would have a good effect, it seems to me, upon the official, whether it be the Secretary or the commissioner, who would look after the carrying into effect of the law, if he knew that if he did not do his duty there was liable to be a resolution put through the Senate or through the House, or a request come from the President or the Secretary of Agriculture, that would order the Federal Trade Commission on the trail to make an investigation.

The incumbent of the office of Secretary of Agriculture may change overnight. He is not selected with regard to his views on this law or any other one law. He is a political appointee, appointed according to what the President elect, whoever he may be, thinks to be the demands of the political situation. That would be one easy way in which the packers could get a Secretary who would be friendly, without the President who appointed him knowing anything about it and without the Senate which confirmed him knowing anything about it.

The commissioner provided for in the Senate committee bill has but one duty to perform. He has nothing else to do except to look after this situation. He is appointed for his qualifications and his ability to carry out this law and none other. So that when he would be appointed there could be no other reason given why this man or that man should be appointed to the office excepting for his qualifications to enforce the provisions of the particular statute. That is the only thing.

Then in another part of the Senate committee bill is another safeguard, which provides that the commissioner can be removed by a concurrent resolution of the House and the Senate, so that while he is in office, if he does not do his duty, it is within the power of Congress, without consulting the President, to remove the commissioner. I do not know how to place any more safeguards around him. I would if I could.

I realize, and I realized it fully after having listened for many weeks to the testimony on the packer situation, that there is perhaps not another combination of men in the world whose silent influence is so great and which extends so fully into every quarter and every portion of the country and even of the world. They are connected up with all the great financial institutions of the United States and with many in foreign countries. Their operations go on all around the world. They have, in my judgment, the almost complete control of the main food products that the American people must buy in order to live.

They are prepared at a moment's notice to send one of their representatives to a meeting of the Women's Christian Temperance Union anywhere in the United States, and at the same time send another one to a gambling den or into the barroom of a saloon or into a church or into a farmers' meeting or into a live-stock association meeting, and every one of them will be an expert. They can cover the country all in the same day and keep it up all the time, and the people who produce beef and pork and the people who eat meat pay the bill. If they control a sufficient quantity of the product to control the price, it matters not how many independents there are following along in their tracks, and there are many. The overhead expense in keeping this great machine going is nothing to them. It comes out of us. We pay the money for our own control and our own undoing.

The evidence, volumes of it, is filled with just those kinds of activities—looking after a legislature in Albany and one in Texas at the same time, fighting a pure food bill in Indiana, Kansas, and Illinois all at once, spreading their literature in every home in the way of advertisements in all the magazines and all the papers, big and little, great and small. The people who deal in the products or use the products, whether as producers or as consumers, pay the bill.

Mr. Swift testified on the witness stand that during that year, at the rate they were spending money for advertising, that firm alone would spend $1,700,000 for advertising. There was not a newspaper in the United States, so far as I have been able to find, that did not get part of it. At the little country crossroads and in the great city of New York all of them had paid advertisements, and at a time while the company were dealing in a product the demand for which they could not supply. They were not advertising to sell their products. I have examined hundreds of their advertisements, and most of them said nothing about anything they had for sale.

I looked through the New York papers a year or two ago, and every one of them, as well as Philadelphia and Chicago papers, was carrying half or quarter page advertisements. I remember one in particular that ran through them all, as far as I was able to find, that spoke of nothing except the patriotism of the employees of the particular packer who was advertising, something that no one had questioned, something that everybody would be willing to admit, but it was a way of getting the money out where they supposed it would do some good.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOODING in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. In this connection I wish to ask the Senator about an advertisement I saw in one of our great magazines a short time ago, a whole page devoted to a eulogy of Judge Landis, paid for by Wilson & Co. What was the object of that? Does the Senator have any idea?

Mr. NORRIS. I think the principal object was to get some money into the hands of the magazines.

Mr. KENYON. Judge Landis was the man who called the grand jury together in Chicago some years ago and worked out the indictment of the packers. I wondered just why that advertisement should carry a eulogy of Judge Landis, and I thought perhaps the Senator might know.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not know, excepting as anyone, I think, from this mammoth scheme of advertising can know what the object must be.

I figured out once the amount being spent. I took some Swift & Co. and Armour & Co. advertisements and figured it out, and I found that for every hour in the day for every day in the year there was being paid for advertising, only for that one item, more than $1,000 an hour. But that is only one branch. They have an army of men scattered over the country everywhere. They are experts, they are able, they are competent.

I have just happened to think of one advertisement that we have all read, undoubtedly. For a long time it ran through all the papers. It was written in the form of a letter. It began, "Dear Folks." The man who did that was a very able man. His name was signed to it. It usually ran about a column in length. He wrote a series of letters in regard to Wilson & Co., always headed "Dear Folks," and he told what a wonderful organization and what a wonderful institution this thing was. There was nothing on its face to show that it was advertising, but, of course, it was. He went on to show, among other things, how sanitary and how pure everything was, and one of the slogans that he continued to use was, "The Wilson label will protect your table." That cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, and they kept it up.

It is not only the payment of the paper for the advertising, but the man who did the writing was a high-class fellow and worthy of a big salary, and got one without any doubt.

While all that was going on, right here in Washington under the shadow of the dome of the Capitol of the country, there was an agent, a man who represented Wilson & Co., selling the products of Wilson & Co., who was arrested for violating the pure food act. He was selling catsup, and, to begin with, it was news to most people that Wilson & Co. were dealing in catsup, but they were. He was found guilty. They opened the cans of catsup. They had five or six of them there, and they opened them all but one. Every one was short. In fact, after they had all been opened but the one, the prosecuting attorney said, "I will agree now to submit the case on that unopened can and we will open it in the presence of the court. If it is short, you are guilty, and if it is not, I will dismiss the case." They would not do that; but the can was opened and, like the others, it was short.

The agent of Wilson & Co. in that prosecution was fined the magnificent sum of $10. I suppose similar cases were in every wholesale house in every city and in every town almost in the United States; and all of them were short; yet the same paper that carried that little notice somewhere on the inside, without any flaming headlines or anything of that sort, of the trial of a big packer for a petty offense carried prominently a column article setting forth how a Wilson label would protect your table. I only mention it as an instance. It could be multiplied by a hundred thousand.

Mr. President, while I am talking about Wilson & Co. I am reminded of another matter which perhaps I ought to mention. Of course, the people pay all the expenses of the packing companies.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator a question. I was very much interested in the statement made by the Senator a little while ago with reference to the multitude of agents who are employed by the packers, all experts, he says, appearing at all sorts of conventions and meetings and representing, in fact, the interest of the packers. I wish to ask the Senator if this vast army of experts who are employed to attend different meetings to use their influence in the behalf of the packers appear generally as the hired agents and representatives of the packers, or does the Senator mean to say that they do not make their employment known?

Mr. NORRIS. Some of them do and some do not. My own idea is that those who are in the employ of and getting a salary directly from the packers, something of that kind, so far as I know, do not conceal their identity. Those who have come in contact with me have not tried to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. But many others, the Senator thinks, do conceal their identity?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did the committee in the course of its investigations find that the packers employed such agents and sent them out to engage in this sort of service?

Mr. NORRIS. They send them wherever they need to do so. Before I conclude I shall give the Senator several instances where such things have happened.

When the Senator from North Carolina interrupted me I was about to go a little further into the subject of Wilson & Co., but before I conclude I am going to take up the provisions of the bill which have been assailed and defend them as well as I can. Those which I do not think are right I am going frankly to say to the Senate that I am not myself in favor of.

Wilson & Co. is headed by a very shrewd man. Mr. Wilson is a very able man. Wilson & Co., as everybody knows, constitute one of the so-called Big Five. It is not the biggest, but it has had within the last few years a remarkable history. It was reorganized; some other business was taken over some years ago—I think less than five years ago—and Mr. Wilson was placed at the head of it. He was given a salary of $125,000 a year.

That looks pretty big to a man who works for two or three dollars a day and yet pays 60 cents a pound for bacon. That salary is what Mr. Wilson gets now unless his salary has been increased or diminished. I have not heard of it being changed. However, that was not all he got when the reorganized company started out. They made him a present when he became the president of the company of $100,000 in cash. That added a little bit to the price of bacon; but that was not all; they also gave him a bonus of $1,500,000 of the common stock of Wilson & Co.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Was he a poor man and in needy circumstances?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not inform the Senator just how poor Mr. Wilson was; but I do not think there is any occasion for his being poor any longer. He was also given, as I have stated, a bonus of $1,500,000 in common stock, which he himself testified he would not sell for par, though at that time it was selling below par. The people have given the company profits enough in the price they have paid for meat and the lower prices that the farmer has received for his hogs to make that stock very valuable.

But that is not quite the end of the story; they also gave him some more besides. In addition to that they gave him an option on $3,500,000 worth of common stock at $10 per share. He took up that option—it was worth more than that—by simply selling a part of it at a high price and paying for the remainder at a lower price. He sold none of it for less than $50 a share and some of it for $55. He had purchased the stock at $10 a share. Of course, the stock did not originally cost anything. When he got through he was the owner of 43,000 shares of stock of the par value of $4,300,000 which had cost him absolutely nothing. In 1917 that stock paid a little over 16 per cent in dividends. That will look good to the farmer who is selling his hogs at less than cost and to the poor devil who is paying 50 cents a pound for meat.

In addition to that, Mr. Wilson was getting the poor man's salary of $125,000 a year, while he had $100,000 to spend as he saw fit without making an explanation as to its expenditure.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, was he making any sacrifices when he accepted the employment at the salary the Senator has named?

Mr. NORRIS. No; he probably received an increase in salary over the amount he had theretofore been paid. I am inclined to think he made great sacrifices working so cheaply and working so hard at such a small salary; it probably was a great sacrifice to him; but he was patriotic; he wanted to help the consumers of meat get something cheap to eat, and he was anxious to have the farmer out on the prairie get a little profit on the hogs and the cattle that he raised. He made sacrifices, no doubt.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what made his services so valuable to this concern?

Mr. NORRIS. He is not an exception to the general rule. I have heard through the investigation what other packers receive by way of salary, and I think he averages up with the rest of them. His services were not particularly valuable, but it was possible for this kind of an operation to be carried on by men who controlled enough of certain food products to set the prices both for the producer and the consumer. This is only one place where the rake-off takes place. It starts in at the stockyards, where the farmer first sells his cattle and hogs, and it runs clear through until the consumer buys the product.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. NELSON. After this man has been so successful, has he built any libraries or started any colleges or sent any missionaries to China or to other foreign countries?

Mr. NORRIS. Not that I know of. I suppose he will have to have an increase of salary before he can do that. He will have to ask a little more for meat at one end and pay a little less for hogs and cattle at the other; then, no doubt, he will be able to perform that kind of an operation.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] asked me about the employees who were sent to various places to look after matters and inquired whether or not they were paid and made known the fact they were paid. A great deal of money is spent in all parts of the country by men who do not appear as employees of these companies. For instance, there has been published in the city of New York for many years a paper called the National Provisioner. I may be mistaken about the name, for I am speaking of these matters mostly from memory, but I think that is the name of a trade paper that goes to the trade in the meat line all over the United States. A man by the name of McCarthy was the editor, manager, or controller of that publication. Mr. McCarthy had died before the Senate hearings took place, but while the hearings were going on there appeared in the committee room one day a man from New York, whose name I can not now recall, but he represented the National Provisioner, and I think he was the successor of Mr. McCarthy. He was very indignant, very much wrought up, and wanted to go on the witness stand immediately in order to refute a charge that had been made against the honest name of Mr. McCarthy. It had been stated that McCarthy had taken some money on the side from the packers while he was running the trade publication.

That charge had been heard by the man who desired to go on the witness stand, and so he went on the witness stand, the committee laying aside everything else in order that he might go on. I am not even charging that this man was not honest; he might have been perfectly honest in everything he said and did. He said he was an old, confidential friend of McCarthy, had known him for years, and had been associated with him on the paper referred to. He resented the idea that against that man's fair name, after he had passed away, there should go out through the newspapers or in any other way a charge that he had ever been guilty of any conduct that was unfair, disreputable, or dishonorable. He said he knew it was impossible for Mr. McCarthy to get a salary from the packers on the side. He told what salary he received from the trade paper and how, when times became hard, his salary had to be increased. The witness might have been perfectly honest in all that he said; and yet, before he left the witness stand, he was presented with copies of correspondence between various packers—documentary evidence, which, by the way, would never have seen the light of day had it not been for the despised Federal Trade Commission—which showed that McCarthy for years had been getting $5,000 a year from the packers, divided up amongst a certain number of the packers; I think three. The correspondence showed that the three packers—if the number was three, and if it was not three it was four—who had been dividing that up and contributing proportionately to the amount, had reached the conclusion that the other big packers ought to bear their share of it; and so the attorney, who was acting as go-between, wrote them and said, "You have not contributed anything toward this $5,000 item that other packers have been paying. This year we will call on you for your share." One of the packers refused to pay his share, and so they had to go to others or to make another assessment to get enough to pay McCarthy, and they did so.

Now the question arises, Why should the packers pay McCarthy anything? What good could he do them? Well, it developed from the Federal Trade Commission's investigation also that in making some appointments in carrying out the pure food act Mr. Hoover wrote to the fellow who was running the National Provisioner, Mr. McCarthy. He was running a trade paper that went to big and little packers all over, and was supposed to represent them all; and I think it was Mr. Hoover; at all events it was some governmental official in carrying out one of our war statutes who wanted to get the names of some little packers, and he wrote to this man to get them. He got them, but he did not get them until after McCarthy had communicated with the big packers and submitted the names of little packers that were satisfactory to them. I suppose he felt that he was earning some of his salary when he did that.

But, Mr. President, it is worth something to control that magazine that goes to the trade. Here was this witness, if he was telling the truth—and I am inclined to think he was—who was a confidential friend of Mr. McCarthy on the same paper, associated with him, working under him for years, and, as he said, he did not know that McCarthy was getting $5,000 a year on the side. Do you suppose that the packers are paying these men these salaries without getting what in their judgment is value received for them?

Why, there was a great lot of trouble down in Fort Worth, Tex., several years ago, where the packers had a stockyard, owned, as I remember now, by Armour and Swift. If I have made a misstatement in regard to any of these details, and there is any Senator here who knows what the facts are, I shall be glad to have him correct me. I think it was Armour and Swift. There was a newspaper there that was unfriendly, just as in some of the legislatures there was some farmer representative that they would have to look out for and get, either directly or indirectly; and so they wanted this newspaper.

A man bought it. Nobody knew that he was connected with the packers. His readers did not know it. The policy of the paper changed. It was very friendly; and if it had not been for this despised Federal Trade Commission, you never would have known the truth.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. But they found that this man had borrowed money of Armour and of Swift; and in one of his letters, when he wrote to get an extension of the loan that he had made from them, he called their attention to the difference in the policy of the paper "before taking and after taking."

I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STANFIELD. Is the Senator aware that there are many newspapers in the country that were originated for the purpose of blackmailing not only packers but other industries when they go into a community, in order to misrepresent them before the public and instill ill will against them, and that perhaps the easiest way to cure that forming of adverse opinion would be to see that some one that was friendly and fair took the ownership of that daily paper?

Mr. NORRIS. In the particular case of which I speak there was no blackmailing that I know of, and if the Senator knows it I should be glad to have him tell it, because I will not defend blackmailing; but does the Senator justify this immense expenditure of money by the packers in order to save themselves from criticism of newspapers or editorial writers?

Mr. STANFIELD. If the criticism was unfair to the packers, and detrimental to the best interests of the people.

Mr. NORRIS. They think it is. They never were criticized in the world but that in their judgment it was unfair.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. On the theory of the Senator from Oregon, it would be the business of Members of Congress, if they had the money, to buy up editors and put men in charge of newspapers who would not criticize their acts in Congress. That would be the ethics of the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I have heard of men in public life who have done that.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STANFIELD. I will say that there is a vast difference between a man engaged in a business which is not a public business, where he has invested his capital, and a Senator or a Representative in Congress. It is not likely that a paper will blackmail a Representative in Congress in order to induce him to pay over his money, but that has happened in many instances with private industries, where they have been held up by papers.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President, I have no doubt that is true. I have no respect for the blackmailer; but if the expenditure of this money—which has gone, as far as I know, into every newspaper office in the United States—is because they were being blackmailed, then that is an indictment against every newspaper in America that it is a blackmailing sheet, and, of course, I do not stand for that. I think there are many papers that receive these advertisements that are not controlled or influenced by them. There are many that keep still because of them. There are others that become active supporters of the men who furnish the money to pay for these advertisements.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. This is enlightening, and may account for the evidence which the Senator remembers was given before our committee of the lobby in Washington, and the distinguished lobbyist who was drawing thousands of dollars from various corporations, including the packers, and giving all kinds of dinners and social functions in Washington to those high up in authority. It may have been that that was for the purpose of preventing any blackmail.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose so.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STANFIELD. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the numerous other representatives of industries, such as our farmers' bureaus and our grange and lumbermen's organizations and textile manufacturers' organizations. In fact, every principal industry has large organizations that pay out money. It takes money to support them; and I should like to call your attention to the fact that the packer is no exception to the general rule—that of educating the public. If the packer were doing something unfair, and misrepresenting himself, it would be a different matter; but I have not come in touch with any evidence or indication that he was doing any more than attempting to set himself right before the public and educating the public as to the function he was attempting to perform.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator say that at a time when the demand for the products of the packing industry was greater than they could supply, Swift & Co., to be concrete, were justified in spending $1,700,000 in advertising in every newspaper in the United States, when they did not in any of their advertisements try to sell anything, because they could not produce enough to supply the demand that was made on them? Was that good business, or did they have some other motive? Was it to prevent the newspapers from blackmailing them, or was it to blackmail the newspapers and, through them, the people of the United States?

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. STANFIELD. I hardly believe that it was for either purpose. I think that perhaps even during the time when the demand was equal to the entire output of Swift & Co. or any other packing company they might go along with their advertising, because they would be aware that there was a time coming when their product would be in excess of the demand; and good business concerns do advertise at all times. Regardless of whether they are oversubscribed in their product or not, they continue their advertising.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will submit that proposition to the American people. As I remember, Mr. Swift said at the time he was testifying that they had spent $1,700,000 the year before, and that at the rate they were going then that one firm alone would spend that year $2,500,000 for advertising. I will submit to the honest American citizens the question as to whether there is any justification for that kind of extravagance, and as to whether, when we know that these corporations control the food we eat, we are going to refuse to give, as the Senate bill gives, any governmental authority the right to go into the books, to inspect them, to find out how far and to what extent this business is going.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I call attention to the fact that many of the businesses of the United States during the war period spent more money than was ever spent by them for advertisements in any preceding year, and more than ever will be spent again. There was a reason for it, but I never approved of it. I do not think it was justified. I do not think they received very much good from the amount of money they spent; but if the Senator has followed the Saturday Evening Post, which contained page after page of advertising during the war period, there were concerns which did that not because of the fact that they had more goods to force upon the market but for the purpose of keeping themselves before the public, and for this reason: Every cent of their excess profits, if they had not paid them out for advertising purposes, with the exception of 20 per cent, would have had to be paid in taxes to the Government. The papers have been full of it; and the merchants asked themselves: "Is it worth one dollar out of every five to put my name before the American people at this time in a way that under ordinary circumstances I could not do?"

Some of the greatest advertisers in the United States during the war period never have and never will advertise again as they did then, and it is for this same reason, I will say to the Senator, that many of the increased wages that were paid for the simple reason as each reasoned, "Unless I pay this extra donation to the head of this department or the head of that department, the whole of it, with the exception of 20 per cent, will go to pay taxes, and I think I will get more out of it by giving it to the head of some of the departments that have been working for years and years and years as employees of the institution." I think the Senator realizes that that was carried on to an extent that was never known in the world before.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, first let me say that no Senator who is supporting the Senate committee bill is contending that it will cure all the evils surrounding the packing industry. The packers are not the only people who have done this business. They have done it more extensively than any other people; but if we were trying to convict somebody for murder before a jury, and the defense came in and said, "This defendant is guilty, it is true, but his neighbor is likewise guilty," it would be no defense for him.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no defense being made for the expenditure of the money. I was simply calling attention to a condition which existed in this country.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not finding fault.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it was a mistake.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand. I am not criticizing the Senator from Utah, but I am going on with the statement he makes here, assuming it to be true. He has said, and it is a fact, that on account of the excess-profits tax they did not have to pay for all of their advertising; that it came out of the Government of the United States; that is, that they paid that much less tax—above 20 per cent, the Senator from Utah said, which is right. Then, it must follow, if that is the answer to the packers' proposition in regard to this expenditure of money, that they were making more than 20 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstood me. Twenty per cent is one dollar out of five, and——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; 20 per cent is one dollar out of five. I agree to that.

Mr. SMOOT. The cost of the advertisement was but 20 per cent of the cost. Under the law, only 8 per cent on the capital and surplus was exempt, and all above that was excess profits.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator was right before—the 8 per cent is the first bracket. They can make 8 per cent without paying any excess-profits tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. And then they pay on a percentage of the next bracket, a larger percentage on the next one, and so on.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong. Wherever it comes into the higher brackets, it all depends on the amount of increase, and 80 per cent is the highest figure.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand; but it goes up just as the income tax does. There is not any dispute about that. I think I know how it goes up, just as the Senator from Utah knows. We agree on that. I took the figures from the Senator from Utah to begin with, but he does not want these now; he is going back to 8 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I never said 20 per cent; never intimated it, and never had it in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. I beg the Senator's pardon. Now, we will take 8 per cent. Before they would pay any excess-profits tax, they must make 8 per cent net. That applied only, as I remember, where they did not have a rate on the three prewar years, did it not? They were allowed to pay an excess-profits tax on what they made on the average in the three years before the war.

Every one of these packers made a good deal more than 8 per cent. I will give Senators the percentages of profit of some of them before I get through.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means, I suppose, that in determining the capital upon which the 8 per cent was allowed, you took the average of the earnings of the three prewar years?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That was on the capital and surplus, not the exemption. There never was an exemption of more than 8 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. But the high rate did not affect their earnings immediately above 8 per cent. We all know what the fact is. Let us not try to get the record wrong. There are different brackets, and they climb up and go up as high as 80 per cent, I believe. There is not any bracket below 8 per cent. You do not pay any excess-profits tax if that is all you make. If you listen to these packers, they will make you believe, through their experts, as they have tried their best to make the American people believe, that they made only 2 per cent. That was one of their misleading advertisements.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the packers never advertised that they made only 2 per cent on the capital invested. They made 2 per cent on the turnover—that is, on the sales—but no packer I ever knew or heard of ever claimed that they made only 2 per cent on the capital invested.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator is so anxious to take care of these packers that he does not let me get through with my statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not interrupt the Senator again, I assure him.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can interrupt me, but I would like to get through with one statement.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says I can interrupt him, and then he objects if I do interrupt.

Mr. NORRIS. I said that they tried to make the American people believe that they made only 2 per cent, and no man can take those advertisements, can take that "Dollar" advertisement which Swift sent to every newspaper in the United States, in which was contained a statement that was intended to deceive the people, and reach any other conclusion. That is what the ordinary person would have thought if he believed what he saw, although if you had analyzed it technically you would find that it said, just as the Senator from Utah said, that it was 2 per cent on the turnover. It had not anything to do with the amount they really make in a year, which might be nothing and which might be very large.

Mr. STANFIELD. The Senator refers to the "Dollar" advertisement which Swift & Co. sent out showing their profits. As I remember that, it said, "This is what Swift makes out of each dollar," and showed 1.8 cents. Was there anything misleading or deceptive about that?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, there was. If the Senator will study it and consider its meaning to the ordinary person, he will, I am sure, admit, that it was not intended to do anything else than make people believe they were not making any money. That was the object of it. One of those years Swift & Co., while they were making a 2 per cent turnover profit, declared a dividend of 33 per cent on their net worth, on their capital stock and their surplus, a great part of which was never contributed by them, but was contributed by the people who buy meat.

When the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] interrupted me, he made a suggestion which reminded me of another man somewhat similar to this McCarthy, who was at the head of the National Provisioner. That was a man by the name of Logan. Mr. Logan was a newspaper correspondent in Washington, a very bright and able man. As the Senator from Iowa said, he was quite conspicuous in society for a while, and yet nobody has ever charged Logan with lobbying among Members of Congress directly for anything. He was a very high-class man. You would not think the ordinary newspaper correspondent was getting as many salaries on the side as he was.

Now, first, what was he doing? He started in with one paper, I believe, and his ability soon became acknowledged by a great many other publications. He was an editorial writer on one paper in Washington for a while. He was an editorial writer on the great commercial paper in Wall Street, the Wall Street Journal, and to my Republican friends let me say he was an editorial writer on the American Economist, which we all get and which a great many Republicans swear by. He was an editorial writer on the Fourth Estate, a trade publication which goes to practically every newspaper in the United States, where newspapers would see his editorials.

I am assuming that his editorial writings were able. I have not read them myself, so I am not complaining about them, and probably would not be able to if I had read them. They might have been all right. But when a man is an editorial writer on a great financial journal, and on a paper which circulates altogether among the followers of one political party, and another paper which reaches all the newspapers of the United States, his viewpoint is worth something. It is worth something to have that man write all these articles from the right viewpoint.

What transpired? It was found that while he was engaged in this lucrative business of writing editorials for all these publications, this man was getting $500 a month from Swift & Co. As far as this bill is concerned that is as far as I ought to go, probably; but that is not the only corporation which paid him, and, as a matter of fact, the truth is, when it is once understood and known, the packers and other similar corporations are intertwined and interlinked in all kinds of ways. Logan was getting $500 a month from Swift & Co.; but he was getting $500 a month also from the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey; and $500 a month from the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana; and $700 a month from the Atlantic Refining Co., which is a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Co., I understand; and $500 a month from the Freeport Sulphur Co., and $500 a month from the General Electric Co. With all his writings for newspapers, and all his salaries from these corporations, including the packer corporation, he ought to have been able to keep the wolf from the door.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, what pretext was offered for paying him these salaries?

Mr. NORRIS. I am coming to that. Let me say again that had it not been for this despised Federal Trade Commission we never would have known that Logan was drawing $500 a month from Swift & Co. while he was writing editorials for us to read in a Washington paper, while he was writing editorials for the bankers of the country to read in the Wall Street Journal, while he was writing articles for the newspaper men of the country to read in their great trade paper. None of them ever suspected that this man was being paid on the side by Swift & Co., by the Standard Oil Co., by the General Electric Co., and by the Freeport Sulphur Co., in most cases $500 a month, and in one case $700 a month.

The question arises, just as the Senator from Arkansas has propounded, What is the excuse for it? Let every Senator ask himself the question, What is the excuse for it? Mr. Logan went on the stand and admitted that he was getting $500 a month from Swift & Co., and when asked to tell what he did to earn the $500 a month he said that he was an expert adviser on publicity, and that is how he got all this money from all the other corporations which were paying him these large salaries. But when he was asked to produce a single letter, a single memorandum, or a single advertisement that he had ever written, that he had ever made while he was drawing this salary, he was unable to do it, and he did not do it.

When Mr. Swift testified, he said the same, that he was an expert adviser on publicity, and yet in all this great advertising scheme about which I have told, in which Swift spent in one year $1,700,000, nowhere was there a trace or a track of Logan, and it was admitted that he never wrote an advertisement, not a single one.

But it did happen, and it was disclosed, that Logan did a good many other things that were not in the line of his employment. As the Senator from Iowa has suggested, his connection here—and any man in Washington who has as much money as he was getting could get almost any kind of connection he wanted—was very high. He gave very fine dinners, and so forth. But in every instance where there was a letter from him to Swift & Co. or a memorandum on which Swift & Co. acted—and there were a good many—it was about something else, never about publicity, never about advertising.

Not in a single instance was there anything of that sort, but he gave Swift & Co. notice of what the pure food bill was going to contain before we knew it in the Senate. Swift & Co. in Chicago knew before Members of Congress knew what was going to be provided in the pure food bill, and when we take into consideration that during those stormy days Congress was more or less a rubber stamp for the President, it can be understood that he would not have had to consult Congress to know what Congress was going to do. He sent them valuable information. He advised them what to do to get ready for the pure food act. I do not know how many things there were that never were disclosed, but never yet has it ever been disclosed that he ever did a thing in the line of what he said and what his employer said he was getting $500 a month for from Swift & Co.

So, in answer to the Senator from North Carolina and the question which he propounded quite a while ago, there are a great many people who are not known to be getting salaries who are, as a matter of fact, and they are engaged in some other business. The real reason this money was paid to men like Logan, not only by Swift & Co. but by these other corporations, was in order to control the various editorials that he and others wrote for the various influential and powerful magazines and newspapers that went into every bank and every home in the land, and in addition to which, of course, was the direct information he obtained as to what was going to happen in the way of legislation in Washington.

Now, Mr. President, how are we going to handle this subject? Are we going to say that these great corporations shall not be controlled through legislation? It is said there are some things in the bill that are harsh. There are things in the bill that I am sorry are necessary to have in a bill, but unless we give some one the right to investigate, unless we give some one inquisitorial authority to go into their books and into their places of business, we will never find out these things, we will never be able to legislate, we will never be able to convict them of a crime. We can not convict $100,000,000 unless we have some way to investigate behind the scenes and get evidence that can not be disputed.

That is all the bill provides. There is not a place in the Senate committee bill, though I think some Senators have gotten a contrary idea, which provides otherwise than that a man can not be convicted of a criminal offense until after he has had his day in court. It is made the duty of the officials of these corporations to permit this investigation, and if they refuse to let the properly authenticated official go in to investigate their books, then they can be brought to trial and that will be before a jury. There is nothing in the Senate committee bill which makes the violation of a rule or regulation a criminal offense until after there has been an opportunity to be heard and until the order is made that they shall desist and cease any unlawful practice, and not then until they violate that order, and then they are tried by a jury. If I could get along with less drastic legislation, I should like to do it.

Armour & Co. started in 1869 with the investment of $120,000, and the first year they made $80,000—66⅔ per cent. They got back practically all of their investment in that year. The next year they made 24.5 per cent, and so on down I can give it in any year except three, which I do not happen to have. One of the lowest years they ever had was in 1894, I believe, when out in the western country at least you thanked God if you were permitted to live, when nobody out there made anything. That year Armour & Co. made 5.6 per cent. The year 1904 was another year when everybody went to pieces all through the West, when there was not a farmer west of the Mississippi and east of the Rocky Mountains who did not lose money, who was not poorer at the end of the year than he was at the beginning. That year Armour & Co. made 4.2 per cent. That seems to be the lowest they ever went. In one year they made in one year 75 per cent, another year 24 per cent, and then on down 28 per cent, 77 per cent, 30 per cent, 60 per cent, 60 per cent, 37 per cent, 34 per cent, 35 per cent, 64 per cent, 43 per cent, 31 per cent, 7 per cent, 24 per cent, 14 per cent, 13 per cent, 12 per cent, 18 per cent, 15 per cent, 14 per cent, 10 per cent, 16 per cent, 16 per cent, and so on; and in 1918 they made 12.6 per cent.

Now, let us see about their capital. They started about 50 years ago with a capital of $160,000. The business has earned $179,270,000—that was up to 1919, a year or two ago—of which $29,866,000 has been paid out to partners and stockholders and the balance invested in the business.

The actual contributions of the stockholders—now, get this and see how much the stockholders have put in—were limited to the original investment of $160,000, the Kansas City investment of $10,125,000 in 1900, which was largely property built up on some unknown original cash investment, and $3,725,000 cash received from preferred stock in 1918. The total stockholders' contributions in cash and property did not exceed $14,000,000 in 50 years, and the Federal Trade Commission say they were probably much less.

Now, I know that it will be contended that when a business like one of these packing concerns makes a big per cent of profit and sets it aside as surplus that they afterwards have a right to issue stock for it. As a technical legal proposition that is true. But they have no moral right to do it provided in the meantime they have been getting reasonable returns on their invested capital.

There has been capital stock issued by the packers in various amounts which came out of their earnings. One hundred million dollars of the capital stock of Armour & Co. came out of their profits. They got these large per cents of profit that I have been reading in addition to that. The dividends I have given you, running up as high as 77 per cent, were paid them through all these years, and yet in the 50 years in which they have operated in addition to all that, there has been $100,000,000 contributed by the people that they have capitalized, and upon which they are now compelling the consumers of the country to pay what they call a reasonable dividend. Swift & Co. have $50,000,000 of that kind of capital stock. Wilson & Co. have $20,000,000 of that kind of capital stock. The Cudahy Packing Co. have $12,777,000 of that kind of capital stock.

Now let me make reference to Morris & Co.—and this is interesting when given consideration in connection with the famous five to four decision of the Supreme Court, in which stock dividends were held to escape income tax. Just listen to this: Morris & Co. issued a stock dividend amounting in round numbers—I figured it out hurriedly here at my desk, and it may be a few points either up or down—of 1,233 per cent in 1921. Of course, it will be said that is nothing, that it was their money, which it was. They never contributed a penny of it themselves, but it came out of the producers and consumers of meat. Thirty-seven million dollars that amounts to, and no tax to pay. That is a stock dividend.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator was that an accumulated-stock dividend that went over a series of years?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. That was after the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. President, I could go on almost without end from the evidence that has been brought out. I only have given to the Senate a few illustrations in order to show the general rule.

Mr. STANFIELD. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STANFIELD. Will the proposed Senate committee amendment limit the profits of the packers?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. STANFIELD. It will not make any difference, or it should not make any difference, with their earnings at all; the earnings of the packers might be just the same as now or they might be 5 per cent or 10 per cent higher or lower?

Mr. NORRIS. There is nothing in the bill which limits the profits of the packers. The Senator does not want to limit their profits, I suppose?

Mr. STANFIELD. I was wondering if it did give that relief or if it was going to give that relief.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator support the bill if we propose an amendment to limit the profits of the packers?

Mr. STANFIELD. No; not if it should at the same time limit their efficiency.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, they would say it would limit their efficiency. Their efficiency consists chiefly in making big profits. They are very efficient in that respect.

Mr. President, what does this overhead mean to the packers? They have nothing to do but to raise meat a cent a pound or cut down a cent in the price which is paid to the farmer and it is fixed up in the twinkling of an eye. I have not gone into the stockyard proposition, where some of the most unheard-of things have happened, and the people have been helpless.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] asks, Will this bill limit the profits of the packers? I say, no. We are merely trying to get where we can obtain real publicity.

The Federal Trade Commission, which investigated the packers, Mr. President, was put on the rack, and every big business—not the packers alone, but every other big business, and every allied financial industry—jumped onto the Federal Trade Commission. They started a propaganda over this country, that has never before been equaled in any similar transaction, condemning the Federal Trade Commission. They did not come forth and deny that what the Trade Commission said was true, but they condemned the Federal Trade Commission for giving the information to the people. The people were startled when the conditions were given publicity.

Mr. President, the Senate committee bill undertakes to give to the commissioner the right to go into all of the offices of the packers and to examine their books. It provides that he can say what system of bookkeeping shall be used and how the books shall be kept. The bill is drastic in that respect, but I do not know how to accomplish anything and be less drastic. If I did, I should do so.

Mr. STANFIELD. Does the Senator from Nebraska mean to say that the commissioner may establish a different system of accountancy than the one which the packers have accepted now?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; that is what I mean.

Mr. STANFIELD. And change all their books?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STANFIELD. And their method of keeping records?

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. STANFIELD. Can the commissioner compel the packers to make that change repeatedly, or only once? May he change their books this year and then change them the next year or the next month?

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose, under the proposed law, he could change their books repeatedly. That is going to be the argument; that will be the packers' argument; that we propose to give a man authority to come in and change the books, and he will come in to-day and he will come in to-morrow and he will come in the next day and change them and will keep that up forever. That has been the argument which has been made here against that proposition. It will be further said it is going to cost the packers so much money that they can not do it.

The facts are that everybody who has looked into the matter understands that even the Federal Trade Commission, on account of the packers' systems of bookkeeping, was unable in hundreds of instances to ascertain just what had happened, and we never shall correctly obtain this information until we provide for the packers, as we provided for the railroads, a uniform system of bookkeeping. To say that the man who is going to provide for the packers a form of bookkeeping—perhaps he will not change their system; perhaps he will only make some slight modification of it—is going to use that power to put the packers out of business is simply to say that the man who shall be so charged with carrying out this bill will be a rascal and selected because he is a rascal. Nobody wants to do that; but if there is anything in bookkeeping—and every Senator knows there is, and that bookkeeping sometimes covers up as well as reveals—somebody must have the authority to provide a uniform system for all the bookkeeping of these institutions and must compel them to follow that system. Then their books will show what actually takes place.

Now, let me take up the bill. I have taken more time than I had expected, but I have not yet nearly gotten through with it. I shall not take the time of the Senate to define the difference in the two bills in reference to the powers and duties of the commissioner and the Secretary of Agriculture. That has been done; I have explained my theory of it. I may be wrong; but if the Senate bill is passed it will go to conference. Of course, the Senate conferees would expect they would have to give way on a good many items. They may have to give way on that proposition. I am not condemning the House bill because it provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the power; but, as I have said before, in my judgment, in view of the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture is a political appointee, selected without his having any especial knowledge of the subject, with his tenure of office uncertain, subject to removal to-morrow, when a different man would come in who knows nothing about the business, the chances are that, with all the ramifications of the packers through financial institutions and kindred corporations, they will be able to name a Secretary of Agriculture without the President who makes the appointment knowing that behind it all and covered up somewhere the real reason for his appointment is his friendship for the packers. Everybody has confidence, so far as I am aware—I know I have—in the present Secretary of Agriculture. So I am not speaking of a man; I am speaking of a principle only.

I now wish to take up some of the provisions of the bill which were discussed and have been objected to. If there is a Senator who thinks any provision of the bill is objectionable, I should be glad to have him interrupt me and inquire about it. As I said before, I am not responsible for everything that is in the bill; there are some provisions in it that I had rather would be out of it, and I think I shall move to strike one or two of them out. I am going, on behalf of the committee, to move to strike out a provision which I think got into the bill by mistake.

I now take up Title III—Duties of packers and operators—and read as follows:

SEC. 12. It shall be unlawful for any packer to—

(a) Engage in any unfair or unjustly discriminatory practice or device in commerce, or in any deceptive practice or device to cheat or defraud in commerce; or

(b) Sell or otherwise transfer to or for any other packer, or buy or otherwise receive from or for any other packer, any live stock or live-stock products for the purpose of apportioning the supply between any such packers, or unreasonably affecting the price of or creating a monopoly in the acquisition of buying, selling, or dealing in live stock or live-stock products in commerce; or

(c) Engage or participate in any manner, either directly or indirectly, in the business of purchasing, manufacturing, storing, or selling foodstuffs other than live-stock products, where the effect of such participation in such business may be substantially to lessen competition in or to restrain commerce or to tend to create a monopoly in commerce.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again? I should like to ask a question there.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. STANFIELD. What do the words "substantially to lessen competition" mean? If by establishing a lesser price competition was eliminated, would it be an unlawful act on the part of the packer to lower prices?

Mr. NORRIS. I should not think so.

Mr. STANFIELD. The Senator would not so construe the provision?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator as to subsection (c) to my mind that is a difficult question and I am not satisfied whether the subsection ought to be in there or out. There are some evils which ought to be corrected, but there are some dangers in connection with it, I admit. When enough power is given to a man, as must be given to any man who undertakes an investigation of the character proposed, to go into these matters, under the power given him he may do harm, if he wants to; I admit that; but that is true of all kinds of business, it is true of every regulation; we can not escape it.

The Senate bill provides that any investigator or Government official who acquires any information and discloses it contrary to the provisions of the bill is guilty of a misdemeanor and can be sent to the penitentiary and made to pay a fine. We tried to surround it with all the protection possible.

Now, reading a little further, there are other provisions on page 38, which Senators have probably read, making certain acts illegal; but, Mr. President, practically every one of those acts is illegal now; almost every one of them would be a violation—I am not sure but that every one would be a violation—of the Sherman antitrust law.

The provisions set forth are not much more than a codification of existing law. If the bill stopped there it never would accomplish any good. It is impossible to convict anybody under such provisions unless there is some way of getting the evidence, and the evidence is all in the possession of the packers. That is the reason the subsequent sections must come in the bill. Further on, in section 14, it is provided that—

No operator shall engage—

That means, in the main, a commission merchant—in any unfair or unjustly discriminatory practice—

And so forth; which is practically the law now.

Section 15 provides:

It shall be the duty of every packer and operator to comply with the provisions of this act and the rules, regulations, and orders which the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may from time to time prescribe in conformity with this act.

It is made the duty of the packers, in other words, to obey the rules as well as the law. That is offered as an objection. I am one who has always looked with a jealous eye upon the granting of power to convict any man or establish a criminal offense for the violation of a rule or regulation that is not set out in the statute; but we can not set out here—no living man could set out here—every rule and every regulation that will be necessary to properly care for this big business. We do not make the violation of those rules a crime until after a hearing and after a notice and after an order, upon which the defendant can go to the Supreme Court of the United States, if he wants so to do. An order is issued that forbids him to do a certain thing; then if he violates it he is guilty; and even then he is tried by a jury. All this talk about making a rule and somebody being sent to the penitentiary for its violation when he does not know and does not have any chance to know anything about it, does not mean anything; there is nothing like that in the bill.

It is made a crime to hinder an investigation; it is made a crime to submit a false report. Why should it not be? It is made a crime to prevent the investigator from examining the books. Why should it not be? If we are going to give the commissioner power to examine the books we must make it a crime to prevent their examination, or he will never be permitted to examine them; do not forget that.

Now, what is the procedure when the rules and regulations are violated? Section 20 provides that—

Whenever the commissioner believes that any packer or operator is violating any provision of this act or any rule, regulation, or order issued hereunder, he shall cause notice in writing to be served upon such packer or operator, specifying the alleged violations, and—

Now notice, he must be served with a notice "in writing," and it must specifically state what is wrong and the definite charge must be set forth, just the same as in any other litigation the bill of complaint originating the action must set out definitely the charge or complaint—specifying the alleged violations and requiring such packer or operator to attend and testify at a hearing before him at a time and place designated therein—

He fixes a time and notifies him to appear—and at such time and place the commissioner shall afford to such packer or operator a reasonable opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel and through witnesses under such regulations as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe.

What is wrong about that? Need any honest man be afraid of that? Is there any danger there to the man who has a good defense to a charge against him that he claims is false? Has he been punished for a violation of a rule or regulation without any notice, without any opportunity to defend himself?

Now, listen. I read on:

If, after such hearing, the commissioner finds that such packer or operator has violated any provisions of this act, or of any rule, regulation, or order issued hereunder, he shall make a report in writing in which he shall state his findings as to the facts, and shall issue and cause to be served—

Now, listen. You would think from the argument that has been made against this provision in the bill that when the commissioner made that finding he was going to send the packer to jail right off; he saw the penitentiary doors opening right before him, and he was pushed right in without any opportunity to defend himself. See what the statute says:

and shall issue and cause to be served on such packer or operator—

He is not even under arrest; he is not even in custody—shall issue and cause to be served on such packer or operator an order requiring such packer or operator—

To do what? To pay a fine? To go to jail? No—to cease and desist from continuing such violations.

The commissioner finds that the packer has violated the rule, the regulation, or the order, and the only thing he has power to do to him is to say, "Stop! Do not do it any more." And if he stops, that is the end of it. Is that vicious? Is that going to hurt an honest man? Is it sending anybody to jail for violation of a rule without a trial? Have we so much sympathy for these great packers that we will not even permit a commissioner to say, "Stop doing wrong"?

Now, let us see what happens after that:

Requiring such packer or operator to cease and desist from continuing such violations.

That is not bad. Is there any honest man who is afraid of that? Will that hurt even a packer who is so sensitive and thin skinned?

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STANFIELD. Referring back to line 8, on page 43, it says:

Or of any rule, regulation, or order issued hereunder.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STANFIELD. Those would be rules that would be made by this commissioner outside of the law.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. STANFIELD. And then they can ask the packing concern to cease.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STANFIELD. On the opinion of these two people they can practically enact a law under which the packer will become a criminal.

Mr. NORRIS. They will hear the evidence; and I am not through with reading the statute. If they find against him he can go on to the court. He does not need to take their word or their finding. I think they would be at least as good as a justice of the peace in an ordinary suit. If I sue the Senator for $100 before a justice of the peace, and I have no right whatever to recover, and I go on and get a judgment by false testimony, and he does not appeal it, it becomes as final as though it were approved by the Supreme Court of the United States; but there is a method of appeal in the law. The Senator always assumes that when we are going to do anything with one of these packers we are trying to do something wrong.

The first law that was ever proposed providing for a justice of the peace court might have been objected to on the same ground. They might say: "Why, suppose a rascal becomes justice. Suppose he is a bad man and he finds an innocent man guilty." Now, that might happen; that is true.

Mr. STANFIELD. I never have known of a justice of the peace promulgating rules of law, or rules that should act as laws.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably a justice does not in all jurisdictions; but there is not a court of record in the United States that I know of that does not have power to make rules, and if the Senator goes in there and violates one of those rules the court can, if it wants to, send him to jail for contempt. Why, that is a common thing. Just a few steps down here is the Supreme Court of the United States, which makes its own rules, and if you violate those rules you may subject your client to the loss of his case, which might mean $40,000,000. The Supreme Court makes those rules and it enforces them.

Now, then, this bill goes on and tells about what shall be done. I do not know that I ought to take the time to read it all; but it goes on and provides that if the packer is dissatisfied with the decision, he appeals it, and it goes to the circuit court of appeals, and the circuit court of appeals takes it up and has a hearing. If that court finds that the matter has not been tried properly, if it finds that the commissioner has not done the right thing, it orders it back to the commissioner and orders him to take more testimony. It practically orders a new trial, and the case goes back, and new testimony is taken, and it comes back again to the court. If the court finds it all right, the court approves it to begin with. If the court finds there is nothing to it, that the commissioner is wrong, the court dismisses it and the man goes free. He has never been in jail. He has never been in the shadow of a jail. No rule or regulation has ever clouded his countenance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make the request of the Senator with a good deal of hesitancy, because I do not really feel competent to discuss the legal phase of the bill; but may I ask the Senator this question: Has the circuit court of appeals any jurisdiction over the reasonableness of the rule laid down by the commissioner?

Mr. NORRIS. Let us see what the statute says. I am reading part of section 21 now, at the bottom of page 44:

> No such order of the commissioner shall be modified or set aside by the circuit court of appeals unless it is shown by the packer or operator that the order is unsupported by the weight of the evidence or was issued without due notice and a reasonable opportunity having been afforded to such packer or operator for a hearing, or infringes the Constitution of the United States, or is beyond the jurisdiction of the commissioner.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. Now, I am not referring to the order, but I am referring to the original rule. Suppose the commissioner—now, this may be an exaggerated illustration; I do not mean to have it taken word for word, but this point is brought up, I think, in the question of the Senator from Oregon in a way; perhaps he had it in mind—suppose the commissioner issues a rule or regulation which imposes an almost impossible condition of affairs upon a man engaged in one of these businesses. The man violates that rule. The commissioner then gives him a hearing, and it is proved upon the hearing to the commissioner's satisfaction that the man has violated the rule. Then may the business man appeal to the court, and bring before the court the question as to whether that original rule is not an utterly impossible thing?

Mr. NORRIS. Taking the Senator's illustration, it seems to me that if I were the judge, and the commissioner had made that kind of a rule, I would hold that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the commissioner. The commissioner can not make a rule that is impossible of performance, and no court would hesitate to set it aside or to hold that he had no jurisdiction to try a man for a rule that he had no right to make in the first place. If the rule was contrary to the law, if it infringed the statute, of course he would have no right to make it. He can not make a rule that is contradictory to the law. He can not require a man to perform an impossibility; and, in my humble judgment, if the rule were of such a nature that it appeared to have been made for the purpose of making it difficult to comply with it, the court would set it aside, or at least it would give all kinds of opportunity to be heard on it and to carry it out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the Senator thinks that that phrase, on page 48, line 4, "beyond the jurisdiction of the commissioner," is the saving phrase in that case?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I do not think so. I think they are all saving phrases. "Infringes the Constitution of the United States" is another one. I think that would be true if it were not put in the law. I do not think that adds anything to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As the Senator knows, sometimes with the best of intent a Government official will issue a regulation, and it may be possible to comply with it, but compliance with it imposes such conditions upon the business itself as to discourage anybody from going on with the business. I have heard of such rulings.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I concede that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. After much argument and trouble, and the employment of attorneys, and hearings and rehearings, generally those rules are finally modified if there is nothing to the contrary in the statute itself. My criticism of this would be—and it is the criticism of a layman, may I again assure the Senator—that the court is not specifically authorized to pass upon the reasonableness of the rule itself.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall have no objection, so far as I am concerned, if the Senator will propose an amendment to provide for that. I realize, as I have said before—I do not want anybody to misunderstand me—that in order to carry out this kind of a law we must confer upon somebody power and authority that can be abused. Why, Mr. President, that is true of every executive officer that we have. The President of the United States, if he wanted to, could get us into war with any country on earth in less than 30 days, and we could not help ourselves. Everybody knows that. Why, if we were making a constitution, and we were as solicitous about the people as some people are about the packers when we pass a law, we would say, "You must not have a President, because he is liable to be a malicious fool, and to run us into war"; and you could not deny it. He might be. There is not a judge on the bench anywhere in any United States court or State court but that could send innocent men to jail and to prison. Sometimes they do it, I think; but shall we abolish our judicial system because of that? When you give a man power, he may abuse it; I do not care what it is. We have tried to safeguard this power; and I will support any amendment which, without taking away the power to make a proper, honest investigation of the packers, will protect every innocent, honest man anywhere and everywhere.

Mr. President, I am not through, but I want to be able to finish, and probably it might be as well now as at any time, since I happen to have that part of the bill before me, to take up an amendment on page 42. I think there will be no objection from any quarter. It is in reality a committee amendment. This language I am moving to strike out appeared twice in the bill, and was to be stricken out in both places, but I find that when it was printed it was only stricken out in one place. The amendment is on page 42, line 7, after the word "court," to strike out these words:

> Each day during any part of which a condition, practice, omission, or course of action punishable under this section is maintained or continued shall constitute a separate violation thereof and shall be punished as a separate offense.

I move to strike out those words.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, before the Senate recesses, I would like to say, particularly to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who has made a suggestion about the reasonableness of rules that the commissioner can make, if there is any danger in it which ought to be corrected, the committee will not object to any amendment which will make it certain.

Personally, I think that one of the vital things in this legislation is the taking away of the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission, and if the Senate committee bill is not agreed to I shall move to amend section 405 of the House bill by striking out of said section paragraph (b), which is the one I read at the beginning of my remarks, which takes away the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission, and in lieu thereof inserting the following:

> Nothing in this act shall affect or take away any of the powers or jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission.

I think I will offer in effect the same amendment as to section 5 of the Senate committee bill, to strike out the section and insert the same language. If I offer those amendments, they will not be committee amendments; they will come from me personally. I offered an amendment to that effect in the committee and it was defeated.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks there is any prospect of a conflict of jurisdiction between the Department of Agriculture and the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. NORRIS. No. The Senate committee bill as it now reads gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the authority to call on the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation any time he wants to on any of these matters, and that part of it received his approval, I understand. It is a difficult matter to know just the right thing to do, and there will be instances, if we pass either the Senate committee bill or the House bill, when there will probably be nobody who will investigate; and that is the reason I am so jealous to retain the administration and the authority of the Federal Trade Commission.

Let us take an instance. Suppose the Federal Trade Commission are investigating the complaint of one manufacturer of clothing against another for unfair competition, which is one of the common kinds of work they do. That clothing is made of wool, which comes from sheep, and that in turn comes through the packers. There would be a very serious question, if we should pass the House bill, as to whether the Federal Trade Commission would be allowed to make that investigation, because wool is one of the by-products of the packing industry, and the jurisdiction is given to the Secretary of Agriculture by the House bill and to the commissioner by the Senate committee bill. The Senate committee bill goes so far as to give the Secretary of Agriculture the right and authority to ask the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation, and they could do it then and save the situation. But these things overlap, and I am afraid there is grave danger that the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission in various things that are on the first blush not connected with the meat-packing industry will be affected and taken away, and I ask Senators to consider that seriously.

Mr. CARAWAY. Under the Senate committee bill the by-products are no longer under the control of the Secretary or the commissioner after they cease to be the property of the packer. So, under the Senate committee bill that conflict can not arise.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it was desired by a good many Senators who are anxious to get away to-morrow that we vote on this bill to-morrow, but in consultation with several Senators who are interested in the matter we have reached the conclusion that it will be an impossibility to get a quorum to-night, and hence it would be useless to make the request. But I give notice now that to-morrow when we convene I shall try to get an agreement for a final vote on the bill, not so much on my own account as on the account of several Senators who are anxious to get away.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate will recess to-night instead of adjourning?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I shall ask that a recess be taken.

Mr. KENYON. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, in parallel columns, an analysis of the bill as it passed the House and the Senate committee bill, with the material points of difference. I think it may be helpful to Senators in studying the bills. While I did not prepare this myself, it has been prepared by a gentleman in whom I have confidence.

Mr. NORRIS. Instead of putting it in the RECORD will not the Senator have it printed in bill form? I had that done with a compilation I had, but the work was of no consequence whatever, because the parallel columns were printed just as the bills run, and the subjects were not put opposite each other. The Senator from Iowa has it properly arranged, I understand.

Mr. KENYON. It takes up each section and compares it with the corresponding section in the other bill, and there is a short résumé. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. McCORMICK. Do the corresponding sections appear opposite one another irrespective of their numerical sequence in the bill?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that was attempted.

Mr. McCORMICK. That seems to be important for our understanding of the matter.

Mr. KENYON. It is not a perfect paper, but it will be helpful.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE AND HOUSE PACKER BILLS.

MATERIAL POINTS OF DIFFERENCE.

HOUSE BILL.	SENATE BILL.
(1) In addition to cattle, sheep, and swine, which are covered by the Senate bill, includes— (a) Horses, mules, and goats. (b) When handled in connection with the packer business, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs.	(1) Forbids any packer, after two years from date the act becomes effective, owning or controlling or having any interest in any stockyard, directly or indirectly, by community of stock ownership, or otherwise, unless the commissioner shall find that such ownership or control or interest is not in violation of the purposes of the act or that the packer has been unable, despite due diligence, to dispose of such ownership or control or interest, in which case he may extend the period.
(2) Does not apply to stockyards having an area of less than 20,000 square feet. The Senate bill applies to all.	(2) Confers investigational authority not contained in the House bill and broader than the authority in the annual appropriation act. The provision is: SEC. 6. The commissioner, upon his own initiative or in cooperation with existing governmental agencies, shall investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption costs, and prices of, and all other facts relating to, the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, handling, or distribution of live stock or live-stock products, including operations of and the ownership of stockyards. He shall likewise compile and furnish to producers, consumers, or distributors, by means of regular and special reports, or by such other methods as he deems most effective, information respecting the condition of the live-stock market and the supply, demand, prices, and other conditions affecting the market.
(3) Forbids rebates, but expressly provides that this shall not prohibit a cooperative association of producers from bona fide returning to its members, on a patronage basis, its excess earnings on their live stock, subject to such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe. The Senate bill does not contain this provision.	(3) Forbids conspiracy to prevent any person from competing. This provision is not in the House bill.
(4) Forbids, as to packers, undue preference to any person or locality. The Senate bill does not have this provision.	(4) Preserves the powers, rights, duties, and obligations of the Federal Trade Commission act for the purposes of this act, but terminates the authority of the Federal Trade Commission with respect to live stock and live-stock products except where the commission is directed to make an investigation by the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, or either branch of Congress.
(5) Makes it unlawful for any market agency or dealer to carry on his business at a stockyard which the Secretary finds subject to the act, unless he registers with the Secretary his name and address, character of business, and kind of services. The Senate bill provides for voluntary registration, as will be indicated below.	(5) Provides for voluntary registration of packers and operators. They are entitled to registration if— (a) The location, character, and extent of their accommodations and facilities are found suitable and adequate for the proper conduct of their business. (b) Their financial resources, credit, and standing are sufficient to assure safe conduct of the business. (c) They agree to comply with and abide by the requirements of this provision and the rules, regulations, and orders of the commissioner. Every registrant is required to conduct his business in a just, fair, and efficient manner and to keep accounts and records and submit reports to the commissioner. The reports shall be open to public inspection. The commissioner may make inspections of the places of business and operation of registrants.

In return for submitting themselves to the regulations prescribed for registrants, the commissioner is required to do the following things for them:

(a) Furnish to them reports embodying existing knowledge of satisfactory and economical applicants and methods of food preservation by cold storage, freezing, cooking, dehydration, or otherwise, and of all improvements in the art, and to detail experienced persons to advise them.

(b) Cooperate with them in procuring adequate services by common carriers.

(c) Furnish to them all available information as to supplies of foodstuffs handled by them, and the location and movement and transportation costs of such foodstuffs.

(d) Provide, when requested, for inspection of live stock, live-stock products, or perishable foodstuffs, received or distributed by them, to determine and certify the quality, quantity, or condition thereof. Any such certificate is made prima facie evidence in any of the courts.

Any certificate of registration may be revoked by the commissioner for violation of the law or any rule, regulation, or order thereunder, and it is made a misdemeanor for a person to forge, alter, counterfeit, or, without proper authority, use any certificate of registration.

(6) Does not contain a provision protecting cooperative associations of producers.

(6) Provides that the authority which it confers as to interstate commerce may be exercised as to commerce wholly within the State when this is necessary for the protection of interstate commerce. This provision is not in the Senate bill, but probably would follow as a matter of law, anyway, under the Supreme Court decisions.

(7) Requires stockyard owners and market agencies to file with the Secretary, and print and keep open to public inspection at the stockyard, schedules showing all rates and charges for stockyard services, and authorizes the Secretary to prescribe the form of schedules.

(8) (a) Forbids any changes in the scheduled rates or charges except after 10 days' notice to the Secretary and to the public, filed and published as required with respect to the original schedule.

(b) The notice must plainly state the proposed changes and the time they are to go into effect.

(c) The Secretary is authorized, for good cause shown, to allow the changes on less than 10 days' notice.

(d) Upon the filing of schedules for new rates or charges or a new regulation or practice affecting them, the Secretary, either upon complaint or his own initiative, upon reasonable notice, may order a hearing concerning the lawfulness of the rate, charge, regulation, or practice, and, pending the hearing, upon filing with the schedule or delivering to the person filing it a statement in writing of his reasons, may suspend the operation of the schedule and defer the use of the rate, charge, regulation, or practice for not more than 30 days beyond the time when it would go into effect, and may extend the suspension for 30-day periods until the hearing can be concluded. After the hearing the Secretary may make an order finding the rate unreasonable and prescribing a reasonable rate.

(7) Penalizes false entries, false statements in a return or report required by the act, altering accounts or records, obstructing Government agents in performing their duties, failure to answer under oath, or otherwise, correctly, all questions being investigated under the act, or to produce records.

(9) Authorizes the Secretary to apply for an injunction to restrain the violation of an order appealed to the circuit court of appeals.

(10) Authorizes the Secretary to investigate any complaint and make an award of damages for the recovery of which suit is authorized to be instituted.

POINTS IN COMMON.

Both bills prohibit—

(1) As to packers:

(a) Unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practices or devices.

(b) Apportioning the supply by interdealing to restrain commerce or create monopoly.

(c) Manipulation of prices by interdealing.

(d) Conspiracy to do any of these things.

(2) As to operators:

Unreasonable rates or charges and unfair or unjustly discriminatory or deceptive practices or devices.

Both require, as to operators, the keeping of accounts and records and authorize uniform methods to be prescribed.

Both provide for the filing of complaints against packers or operators, the holding of hearings, and the issuing of orders to desist from any unjust practice or collecting any unreasonable charge, for appeals to the circuit court of appeals from any order, and for review ultimately by the Supreme Court. Both make the decree of the circuit court of appeals affirming or modifying an order operative as an injunction pending final determination by the Supreme Court, if it is carried that far.

Both penalize the violation of an order which has become final through failure to take an appeal or by affirmance or modification by the appellate court, if not carried to the Supreme Court, or upon affirmance by the Supreme Court.

Both provide for compulsory attendance of witnesses and production of records, etc.

ADMINISTRATION.

The House bill provides that it shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The Senate bill is to be administered by a Federal live-stock commissioner, to be appointed by the Secretary at a salary of $7,500 per annum, and the commissioner is to enforce the act under the direction of the Secretary, and may be removed by the President or by concurrent resolution of Congress for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.

The commissioner is authorized to appoint such officers, employees, and agents and to make such expenditures to carry on his business as may be necessary, the appointments to be made under civil-service rules.

WHO IS REGULATED.

HOUSE BILL.

Packers: Meaning persons engaged in the business of—

(1) Buying cattle, sheep, swine, horses, mules, or goats for slaughter.

(2) Manufacturing or preparing meats and all edible products and by-products of the slaughtering and meat-packing industry for sale or shipment.

(3) Manufacturing or preparing products and by-products, other than meats and edible meat-food products, of the slaughtering and meat-packing industry for sale or shipment.

(4) Marketing meats, meat-food products, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs.

Note: Certain exceptions in the definition of packers exclude from the operation of the bill persons engaged in manufacturing, preparing, or marketing live-stock products, meats, meat-food products, dairy products, eggs, etc., where they do not also buy live stock for slaughter or manufacture or prepare meats or meat-food products for sale or shipment and have not more than a certain percentage of financial interest in the buying of live stock for slaughter, and manufacturing or preparing meats or meat-food products for sale or shipment.

Stockyard owners, market agencies, and dealers: Meaning persons engaged in the business of conducting or operating a stockyard, persons engaged in the business of buying or selling live stock at a stockyard on a commission basis or furnishing stockyard services, and persons not a market agency but who are engaged in the business of buying or selling live stock at a stockyard either on their own account or as employees or agents of the vendor or purchaser.

SENATE BILL.

Packers: Meaning persons engaged in the business of slaughtering cattle, sheep, and swine or preparing products and by-products of the slaughtering and meat-packing industry derived from cattle, sheep, and swine and owned or controlled by the packer, for sale, and persons engaged in the business of marketing these products as a subsidiary of or an adjunct to any such slaughtering or preparing business.

Operators: Meaning persons engaged in the business of conducting or operating a stockyard in which cattle, sheep, and swine are handled, and any trader or commission man or other person performing services with respect to cattle, sheep, and swine handled in or in connection with a stockyard.

ACTS MADE UNLAWFUL.

HOUSE BILL.

Packers shall not—

(1) Engage in any unfair practices.

(2) Make or give undue preferences to any person or locality.

(3) Apportion among themselves the supply if the effect is to restrain commerce or create a monopoly.

(4) Manipulate or control prices or create a monopoly by selling to or buying from any other person or by any other means.

(5) Conspire, combine, or agree with any other person to do any of the foregoing forbidden acts.

(6) Fail to obey any order of the Secretary of Agriculture to desist from violating the act when such order, because of no appeal or upon appeal and affirmance, becomes final.

Stockyard owners and market agencies shall not—

(1) Make any unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory rate or charge for stockyard services.

(2) Make changes in rates or charges filed and published by them except after 10 days' notice to the Secretary and to the public.

(3) Establish, observe, or enforce unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory regulations or practices.

(4) Make any rate, charge, regulation, or practice which shall cause any undue or unreasonable advantage, prejudice, or preference as between persons or localities in intrastate, interstate, or foreign commerce.

(5) Carry on business until their rates and charges have been filed and published.

(6) Charge, demand, or collect a greater or less or different compensation than the rates and charges specified.

(7) Rebate; but cooperative associations of producers may, in good faith, return to their members, on a patronage basis, excess earnings on their live stock, subject to regulation by the Secretary of Agriculture.

(8) Extend to any person any services not specified in their schedules.

Stockyard owners, market agencies, or dealers shall not—

(1) Engage in or use any unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practice or device in connection with the receiving, marketing, feeding, watering, holding, delivery, shipment, weighing, or handling of live stock.

(2) Fail to keep such accounts, records, and memoranda as prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Market agencies and dealers shall not carry on their business at any stockyard until they have registered with the Secretary their name, address, and character of business.

SENATE BILL.

Packers shall not—

(1) Engage in any unfair or deceptive practice or device.

(2) Apportion supply or unreasonably affect prices or create monopoly by interdealing.

(3) Engage in business of purchasing, manufacturing, storing, or selling foodstuffs other than live-stock products, where the effect may be substantially to lessen competition or restrain commerce or tend to create a monopoly.

(4) Conspire, combine, or agree to apportion territory or purchases or sales of live stock or live-stock products or to control prices thereof, or to do any act to prevent any person from competing with them.

(5) Do or abet any forbidden act.

(6) Own, control, or have any interest in any stockyard, after two years from the effective date of the act, unless the commissioner shall determine that such ownership or control or interest is not in violation of the purposes of the act or that the packer has been unable, with due diligence, to dispose thereof, in which case the commissioner may extend the period during which it may continue.

Operators shall not engage in any unfair or deceptive practice or device, or charge, collect, receive, or demand any unreasonable charge or rate for any service performed.

Packers and operators shall not—

(1) Fail or refuse to make full and true entries in their accounts and records.

(2) Make false entries in their accounts or records.

(3) Alter, mutilate, cancel, or destroy any account or record.

(4) Make any false or fraudulent statement in a return or report required by the act.

(5) Hinder, obstruct, or resist Government agents in performance of their duties.

(6) Fail to answer under oath or otherwise correctly all questions being investigated under the act or to produce books, papers, records, and correspondence.

(7) Fail to obey any order of the commissioner to desist from violating the act when such order, because of no appeal or upon appeal and affirmance, becomes final.

BY WHOM ENFORCED.

HOUSE BILL.

By the Secretary of Agriculture.

SENATE BILL.

By the Federal Live Stock Commissioner, appointed by the President at $7,500 per year.

The commissioner is to enforce the act under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture and may be removed by the President or by concurrent resolution of Congress for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.

The commissioner is authorized to appoint such officers, employees, and agents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and to make such expenditures for carrying on his business as may be necessary, all such appointments to be made under civil-service rules.

The commissioner's principal office shall be in the District of Columbia, but he may exercise his powers at any other place.

POWERS CONFERRED.

HOUSE BILL.

The Secretary of Agriculture may order any stockyard owner, market agency, or dealer to discontinue any unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practice or device.

In addition to penalties for failure to comply with the order, the Secretary or any party injured thereby may apply to the proper Federal court in an appropriate action for enforcement of the order.

The Secretary, upon complaint or upon his own initiative, may enter upon a hearing concerning the lawfulness of any rate, charge, regulation, or practice of a stockyard owner or market agency, and may suspend the operation thereof for 30 days, and after full hearing thereon he may order the same permanently discontinued.

Upon complaint of any person of anything done or omitted to be done as required by the act by a stockyard owner, market agency, or dealer, the Secretary of Agriculture shall require the stockyard owner, market agency, or dealer to file an answer, and the Secretary shall make such investigation as may be necessary, and if he finds that the complainant is entitled to an award of damages he shall make an order directing that it be paid. The person in whose favor an award is made may institute suit thereon in either the Federal or State courts. The findings and orders of the Secretary of Agriculture are made prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated.

The Secretary of Agriculture may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, or District or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or any person in the enforcement of the act.

SENATE BILL.

All powers, rights, remedies, duties, and obligations conferred and required by the Federal Trade Commission act are reserved to the Federal live stock commissioner, the courts, and all persons affected by this act, except as modified by this act.

The commissioner himself, or in cooperation with existing governmental agencies, is required to investigate and ascertain the demand for, supply, consumption costs, prices of, and all other facts relating to ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, handling, or distribution of live stock or live-stock products, including operations of and ownership of stockyards.

The commissioner shall compile and furnish to producers, consumers, or distributors, by means of regular and special reports, or otherwise, as he may deem effective, information respecting the condition of the live-stock market, the supply, demand, prices, and other conditions affecting the market.

The commissioner may compel attendance and testimony of witnesses relating to any of his investigations, and he or any examiner designated by him may issue subpœnas and administer oaths. If the person summoned disobeys the subpœna, the commissioner may invoke the aid of the Federal courts to require attendance and testimony and production of books, papers, etc. Witnesses shall receive the same fees and mileage as in the United States courts.

The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, shall make such rules, regulations, and orders as are necessary to carry out the act, and may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, or any State or political subdivision thereof, or with any person.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall serve a complaint in writing upon any packer who he has reason to believe has violated, or is violating, any of the provisions of the act applicable to packers, and may require the packer to attend and testify. The packer shall be heard in person or by attorney and may introduce witnesses. Any person, for good cause shown, may be allowed to intervene.

Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture is of opinion that any rate, charge, regulation, or practice of a stockyard owner or market agency is or will be unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory, he may—

(1) Determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable rate or charge to be observed thereafter and what regulation or practice is or will be just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory and thereafter followed.

(2) Order such owner or operator to discontinue such violation.

The Secretary of Agriculture may require stockyard owners and market agencies, in their schedules, to state plainly their rates and charges in detail, and may prescribe the form and manner in which they shall be stated.

If the Secretary finds that the packer has violated, or is violating the provisions of the act, he shall make his findings accordingly, and shall order the packer to cease and desist. Such order shall be final and conclusive on the packer unless within 30 days the packer appeals to the circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which his principal place of business is located.

When notified by the clerk of the circuit court of appeals, the Secretary of Agriculture shall certify to the court all the papers in the case, and on application of the Secretary at any time thereafter, the court may issue a temporary injunction against the packer. Additional testimony may be taken on order of the circuit court of appeals, and such testimony shall be certified to the court by the Secretary when taken. The decree of the circuit court of appeals, if adverse to the packer, operates as an injunction.

The packer may remove the case to the Supreme Court of

The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, shall fix fair and reasonable practices, charges, and rates to be observed by operators.

The commissioner may prescribe uniform systems of accounts and records to be kept by packers and operators, and he and his agents may enter and inspect the place of business of the packer or operator and examine their books and records.

The commissioner may order any packer or operator to cease violating any provisions of the act, or rule, regulation, or order thereunder. Such order shall be final and conclusive unless within 30 days an appeal is taken to the circuit court of appeals in which their principal place of business is situate.

The clerk of the court shall notify the commissioner as soon as appeal is taken, and the commissioner shall forthwith send to the court all the papers in the case. The court may order the taking of additional evidence, and the commissioner shall transmit the additional evidence to the court. If the decree of the court is adverse to the packer or operator, it shall operate as an injunction.

The packer or operator may have the case removed to the the United States on a writ of certiorari within 60 days.

Stockyards which do not embrace more than 20,000 square feet, exclusive of runs, alleys, and passageways, are not included in the act, and the Secretary is required to ascertain what stockyards are subject to regulation and to give public notice thereof.

VOLUNTARY REGISTRATION OF PACKERS AND STOCKYARDS.

The Senate bill contains a title designated as above. The House bill contains nothing like it.

This title, as its heading implies, is not compulsory. The persons engaged in the businesses covered thereby may or may not take advantage thereof, as they see fit. If they do take advantage of this provision, they receive from the Federal Live Stock Commissioner a certificate of registration to engage in or carry on that particular business, and they thereby receive the benefits intended to be conferred thereby.

The businesses covered are the conduct or operation of stockyards, the slaughtering of live stock, and the processing, preserving, or storing of live-stock products or perishable foodstuffs.

They are entitled to registration if—

(1) The location, character, and extent of their accommodations and facilities are found suitable and adequate for the proper conduct of their business.

(2) Their financial resources, credit, and standing are sufficient to assure safe conduct of the business.

(3) They agree to comply with and abide by the requirements of this title and the rules, regulations, and orders of the commissioner.

Every registrant is required to conduct his business in a just, fair, and efficient manner, and to keep accounts and records and submit reports to the commissioner. The reports shall be open to public inspection. The commissioner may make inspections of the places of business and operation of registrants.

In return for submitting themselves to the regulations prescribed by this title, the commissioner is required to do the following things for registrants:

(1) Furnish to them reports embodying existing knowledge of satisfactory and economical applicants and methods of food preservation by cold storage, freezing, cooking, dehydration, or otherwise, and of all improvements in the art, and to detail experienced persons to advise them.

(2) Cooperate with them in procuring adequate services by common carriers.

(3) Furnish to them all available information as to supplies of foodstuffs handled by them, and the location and movement and transportation costs of such foodstuffs.

(4) Provide, when requested, for inspection of live stock, live-stock products, or perishable foodstuffs, received or distributed by them, to determine and certify the quality, quantity, or condition thereof. Any such certificate is made prima facie evidence in any of the courts.

Any certificate of registration may be revoked by the commissioner for violation of the law or any rule, regulation, or order thereunder, and it is made a misdemeanor for a person to forge, alter, counterfeit, or, without proper authority, use any certificate of registration.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I offer two amendments, which I would like to have printed and lie on the table. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and other Senators interested in the bill to one of the amendments. The Secretary need not read them.

The one to which I call attention is on page 30, commencing in line 22. The bill now reads:

> The term "operator" means any person engaged in the business of conducting or operating a stockyard in which live stock is handled in commerce.

So far, so good; we all know what that means. Then it goes on:

> And any trader or commission man or other person performing services wholly or partly in commerce with respect to live stock handled in or in connection with a stockyard.

My amendment is to strike out the words "trader or," and I have this thought to suggest to the Senator: If the bill means what I think it does it means to apply the term "operator" to a trader who is performing services, and traders do not perform services. I think there is a misunderstanding about what a trader is in the stockyards. A trader is a man who buys cattle in the yards on his own account and for his own profit and sells the cattle, if he chooses to sell them, to anybody. The bill does not define the word "trader." If the word "trader" means what I think the committee thought it meant—that is, any man who makes it a business to buy and sell cattle in the stockyards—it will include thousands upon thousands of ordinary cattle producers.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New York if he does not believe that there should be some definition of what are known as "scalpers" and "traders" in the yards, those who make a business of speculating and dealing in live stock in the yards?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have given a lot of thought to that, and having been in the yards a good deal myself, I do not see how you can draw a definition to include the people to whom the Senator refers without including every man who buys or sells cattle.

Mr. KENDRICK. Does not the Senator believe that the definition might be narrowed to those who make that their principal business and confine their operations largely to the stockyards? I have asked the question for very good reasons.

As the Senator knows, some of the bitterest complaints that have arisen in connection with dealings in the stockyards have been directed at this very agency, as we call it in the bill, of buying and selling on speculation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They do not buy and sell for speculation. They pay cash.

Mr. KENDRICK. Oh, yes. That is what I mean. There is just that difference of meaning in the same thing. I spoke of the men who poll for profit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We all do that.

Mr. KENDRICK. There has been continuous complaint, and some of the Senator's very good friends who are connected with the packing-house industry have told me personally that there are great abuses existing in places, in spite of the fact that ordinarily they perform a very useful function. The supposition is that they take up the surplus when there is a surplus, and carry it over to days on which there is a shortage.

While they do perform this useful function there has been bitter complaint, as I have stated, of irregularities on the part of those traders and scalpers in their dealings with the commission firms of the yards?

Mr. WADSWORTH. With the commission firms?

Mr. KENDRICK. Yes; unfair practices between the two.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have never heard that. I do not understand how that can happen.

Mr. KENDRICK. Those complaints have come to me in connection with the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It might very well be true that some commission men would like to drive them out of business because they compete with them.

Mr. KENDRICK. I think the commission men find them to be a very useful part of the trade. As I said, under legitimate conditions, it is a desirable part of the whole system. There is no question about that. The only difference between myself and the Senator from New York is that I would limit the definition so as not to include the man who comes into the yard and makes his purchases and goes away with them, but the man who goes there and stays there and trades and makes it a part of his business should by all means be included in the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator desires to do that, his bill does not accomplish it, because the bill applies, under the term "operator," only to traders who are performing a service. Traders do not perform any service.

Mr. NORRIS. They are supposed to perform service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For whom?

Mr. KENDRICK. That is true, and I have had it called to my attention before.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The phrase "performing a service," may I say to the Senator from Nebraska, means a service in a representative capacity for some other person. A commission man performs a service. The stockyards management performs a service. It sells services or facilities.

The commission man sells his selling ability, his skill, to the owner of the cattle and acts as his agent; he performs services for the owner of the cattle in selling them. The trader, however, serves no one. He acts entirely on his own account.

Mr. KENDRICK. Yes; that is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He represents no one but himself. Take the man who makes it a practice—and there are many hundreds of those people, though some of these things are not very pretty to talk about—to buy the dead hogs that are occasionally, in fact quite often, found in the pens. He is known in business as a trader, but he does not serve anybody.

He buys the carcasses and sells them to rendering companies outside the yards.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does he not buy live stock?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am speaking of just the one kind of trader. That is an example. There is another kind of so-called trader, and I agree with the Senator that they are most valuable for the yards. If I may inject a personal note I have often dealt with them. Another kind of traders, and an overwhelming majority of them are most responsible people, make it a business to go into the yards themselves and buy loads of cattle for their own account, not for anyone else, not performing any service to any one else. They take title to the cattle. Then an outside buyer, like myself or the Senator from Wyoming, arrives, looking for a certain kind of animal that he wants to buy. He may ask the commission man if they have a load or two of that type, and he may not be able to find among them just what he wants. He will encounter the trader, and ask the so-called trader, "Have you anything of the kind I am looking for?" The trader then says, "I think I have. Come around to pen No. 225 with me," and he sees the cattle, and buys them from him; that is all. On the other hand, the trader may take those cattle which he purchases and ship them out into the country to fill an order placed with him by a feeder 500 miles away. He sells them. He is not performing a service.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator from New York permit me just a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not the Senator think, looking at the entire phrase "performing services wholly or partly in commerce," that it gives a different meaning? Does he not perform a service in commerce although he is not serving any individual? He is a part of the machinery by which the stock moves from the producer to the final consumer, and he thereby does perform a service in commerce. That is what the phrase says.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, if that is the construction of it, any man who buys and sells cattle anywhere is performing a service in commerce.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; because he must buy or sell in a stockyard and perform a service in commerce.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator say that when I go to the stockyards to buy some cattle, which, I may say, I sometimes do, I am a trader?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator say on the ground that I am performing a service in commerce?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think so. That is not the kind of person this provision reaches, if the Senator from New York will pardon me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not see it any other way.

Mr. KENDRICK. I feel sure that the Senator from New York, with his intimate acquaintance with this industry, understands clearly the difference between the man who comes from the country and buys and the man who makes it a part of his business to handle regularly the receipts of the yards—the man who is a part of the system in the yards and whom we recognize as such.

I agree with the Senator in thinking that the majority of them are high-class men. A group of them were in my office less than a week ago, talking to me about some of the exacting provisions contained in the bill as it passed the House. I think some of those provisions should be changed, if we finally adopt the House bill, and I intend to offer an amendment to that effect to protect those men. However, they do not deny that they are a part of the system within the stockyards.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is perfectly true; they are.

Mr. KENDRICK. I wish to call to the Senator's attention a thing I do not like to do here, because I have refrained from the time the discussion began from bringing to light the things within the stockyards that are disreputable and not to the credit of the great system under which we market our stock, but one of the things against which there is complaint lodged is collusion between the commission firm and the trader by which they share in the profits. I do not know how much truth there is to that. I have said here previously and I say now that the great majority of the men in the stockyards, both the commission men and the traders, are perfectly reputable, splendid business men of the finest integrity, but I am speaking of the man who is not of that kind. The difficulty comes in right there. If these men are not under that supervision they would escape entirely, and I think they do not ask to escape.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think they do, but the object of putting them in is exactly the same as putting the commission men in.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They do not do the same kind of business at all.

Mr. NORRIS. No; they do a different kind of business.

Mr. KENDRICK. They may be, as the Senator from New York said, not properly defined in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are not defined at all.

Mr. KENDRICK. They should be correctly defined and should not be eliminated from the provisions of the bill.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 10, 1921:

S. 1084. An act to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes.

On June 11, 1921:

S. 1154. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Des Moines River at or near the city of Dumas, Mo.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 10th instant they presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 86) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

OIL PROSPECTING IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES (S. DOC. NO. 39).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, on motion of Mr. LODGE, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the Senate's resolution of March 10, 1920, requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate—

"First, as to what restrictions, if any, are imposed either directly or indirectly by France, Great Britain, Holland, Japan, or any other foreign country, or the dependencies thereof, upon the citizens of the United States in the matter of prospecting for petroleum, or in the acquisition and development of lands containing the same within the territory subject to the jurisdiction and influence of such countries.

"Second, if such restrictions exist, what steps have been taken by the Government of the United States to secure their removal and equality of treatment in respect of citizens of the United States.

"Third, if any restrictions are imposed by the Government of Mexico upon citizens of the United States in regard to the acquisition or development of petroleum-bearing lands within its jurisdiction which are not imposed upon nationals or other foreign countries.

"Fourth, if any such discriminating restrictions are imposed by the Government of Mexico upon citizens of the United States, what steps have been taken by the Government to secure removal of such restrictions and the equality of treatment in respect to citizens of the United States."

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, furnishing information requested by the resolution, supplementary to that embodied in reports submitted May 14, 1920, and April 6, 1921, as far as such information can be supplied compatibly with the public interest.

WARREN G. HARDING.

(Inclosure: Report by the Secretary of State.)

THE WHITE HOUSE,
June 13, 1921.

TUG FORK OF BIG SANDY RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 4091) granting the consent of Congress to the Borderland Coal Corporation to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, in Mingo County, W. Va., and I submit a report (No. 112) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Borderland Coal Corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, and at or near Borderland, in the county of Mingo, State of West Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 14, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 13, 1921.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, grant that our citizens everywhere may be deeply concerned in the cultivation of those national virtues that shall enable our Republic to go on from strength to strength. Promote fraternity and cooperation among all of our citizens through the symbolism of the uplifted flag. May its individualism appeal to the lowliest and its self-reliance to the weakest, and grant that its courage may inspire all, and arch our land from coast to coast and from border to border with that sublime optimism of the Christian faith. O Columbia, Columbia, God shed His grace upon thee that our flag, with its stars of light and bars of white and the red of our Nation's sacrifice may ever wave over the land whose God is the Lord. In Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 11, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment No. 1 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6300) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

TERMINATION OF THE WAR.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, though a new Member of the House, I am not obsessed with the belief that my remarks will have any influence in shaping the course of this legislation. But however useless the effort, I will, at least, have the satisfaction of protesting against this first selfish, backward, and cowardly step taken by my country.

I want also to use this opportunity to discuss the statement of our reasons for entering the war made by our ambassador to England, and state that, so far as Kentucky is concerned, I can speak authoritatively, that his statement that our aims were selfish is recklessly untrue.

So holy was our cause considered, such a blessing was to flow from our victory, that the courthouses were abandoned and our meetings held in the churches, and with patriotism godly men and women strove to their utmost, believing they were opening a way for "peace on earth, good will toward men."

Men from my country went to war believing that Belgium had died for civilization; that France, to whom we owe our independence and our everlasting gratitude, was bleeding to death; that the men and women of all Europe were being murdered and ravished by a frightful coalition of German and Turk. They were told that should they never return their lives would have been given in beautiful sacrifice for future peace. Their sons would fight and their daughters weep in wars no more.

In many a country church I told these stalwart folk, feeling that I was talking with divine sanction, that in doing our part we were advancing sacrificially, not selfishly, the Kingdom of God. We all believed what I told them, and this man who publishes to the world that we entered the war not to benefit mankind but because we were afraid not to accuses me of being a party to a hellish fraud; and I want to say as forcibly as my command of language will permit that, whatever Col. Harvey's motive might have been, so far as my people are concerned, it is a malicious falsehood.

Every patriot resents it. The great metropolitan Republican newspapers denounce it.

I will quote the Philadelphia Inquirer:

> He deliberately and wickedly misrepresented his country.

And again:

> Unless he is forbidden to talk in public on international questions, he is certain to bring discredit on the Harding administration.

What amuses me is that pretended doubt should exist in any mind that this discredit properly belongs on the Harding administration. Who selected Harvey for this most important diplomatic post? Were not his views that are now so vigorously denounced well known to President Harding when he selected him? Was he not also known as one who would at the first opportunity give voice to his vindictive views? Was he not also known as a dealer in choice billingsgate and hatred?

If these facts were known, and they were, and yet he was selected for this most important position, then the Harding administration is justly entitled to bear the discredit of having our beloved country slandered abroad. Can one select a reckless, drunken chauffeur to drive through a crowded thoroughfare and be blameless for the disaster sure to follow?

How tactless and stupid these remarks were, as well as false, can only be realized when we remember how in the past other nations considered us. Our rich tourists have been the laughingstock of Europe; they have descended with their gold seeking to purchase a knowledge of art and literature by acquiring a collection of the works of the old masters. Europe had judged America by these false types, lavishing in wealth and display and lacking in refinement and culture. Col. Harvey rises to assure them that their previous unfavorable opinions were all correct.

Lest we forget I will remind you of some statements made by us during the war and which seemingly have been discarded by the majority, but which I am glad to reaffirm because they were and yet remain the truth.

When the Great War broke out Europe knew that America, with its exhaustless resources, was not in peril, and when under the inspired guidance of Woodrow Wilson it unselfishly took up the cause of right and humanity it became the champion of oppressed peoples, a big brother to the sister nations, the hope of a despairing civilization, and a beacon light to wavering Christianity.

The world for the first time saw the great American Nation as we know it to be, and in the short space of one administration—I am proud to say a Democratic one—our Nation became the beloved of all nations, and in influence and power stood out like Saul among his brethern.

Alas, under this short Republican régime what a sad spectacle she presents. I feel like exclaiming with David of old, "How are the mighty fallen." Yesterday the proud proclaimer of unselfish aims, to-day the cowardly renouncer of every noble impulse. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yesterday the eagle bathing his plumage in the sun, to-day the bat seeking the dark, foul cavern in which to hide.

When this resolution is adopted we abandon our allies and align with our enemies. Our position as conqueror is abandoned and we accept a position of negotiator.

All questions arising out of the war are to be settled by a treaty made, if Germany will consent to make it. We can not force her, for we will be at peace. We then receive no apology for the past nor promise for the future.

But they say a treaty is to follow. If Germany is the bandit and robber and tyrant we have said, why not agree to terms before we unload our guns? Why order our dinner before reading the menu?

No; the only reason for this legislative abortion is to relieve the Republican administration from the responsibility of its own folly.

While I consider this resolution infamous in both Congresses, there was at least a reason for it in the last Congress, for then the President and the Senate, who constitute the sole treaty-making power, were in hopeless disagreement. But now the President and the Senate are in accord, and can any reason be given why the President does not act? He has made no effort but to deal in glittering generalities.

You hear so much about encroaching on the President's prerogatives. It is not so much that that I object to as it is relieving him of responsibilities placed upon him by the Constitution. I am tired of his talking on both sides of every question and acting on neither side of any.

Does he indorse or renounce Harvey's slander on this country? Like his preelection position on the League of Nations, both sides claim him.

Is he going to call a conference of the nations to consider disarmament? Why does he not issue the call? I will tell you the reason: Because he would be told that 48 of the leading nations of the world are now in conference, and disarmament is their chief consideration, and they would welcome him into their conference.

If the President is not satisfied with the treaty that all our allies accepted, why does he not submit one of his own framing that is better, so that we may learn the terms before we declare the status of war at an end?

A word to some of my Democratic colleagues. The people are not in favor of this subterfuge where they understand it.

If you will excuse a personal reference, this resolution was an issue of my campaign, and I promised my people to vote against it, my opponent had already voted for it. That and the League of Nations were the sole issues.

There is no more enlightened district in the United States than the district I have the honor to represent, the eighth district of Kentucky, and in no district was there a harder fight made. Every paper discussed the league in every issue. President Harding made five speeches in my district, Vice President Coolidge three, and every prominent Republican available was sent into it. My opponent, an able speaker, and I made two speeches a day for six weeks before the election. And that district, which had gone Republican by 1,600 a year before, and then represented by a Republican on this floor, on that issue went 3,000 Democratic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is true that President Harding received a large majority in the country at large by using the same kind of tactics being played now, but not on this issue, or on the issue of the League of Nations, but because he received the votes of those like Secretary of State Hughes, "As the surest way of entering in," and also the votes of those like Senator JOHNSON "As the surest way of staying out."

I have known men able to escape taking any side, but he is the only man I have ever known with such transcendant ability as to be considered the champion of every side. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] It would be refreshing to the entire country to be able to agree as to where he stands on some one question.

I would like to know what the terms of peace are going to be, before I help to make it.

The most eloquent speech I have read on this resolution, when it was previously before the House, was delivered by the distinguished Republican from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY]. He said:

> If any man had said while the war was in progress that when the war was over he would be willing to make a separate peace with Germany, without terms or without guaranties as to the restoration of Belgium or France, he would not have been safe in any community in the United States. What change has taken place that we should propose such a change now?

He also said:

> This is so inconsistent with everything that has been done, let's don't mar our record.

I am not so apprehensive of that as of the tragedy to result from the folly of halting the onward progress of civilization for 50 years. He said in conclusion:

> Others may do as they please, but it will never be done with my vote.

Likewise, my fellow countrymen will never grasp the hands of German officers, murderers of men, and ravishers of women, allies of Turkish assassins reeking in the blood of disemboweled Armenian children, as equals, and sit with them as such to discuss terms of treaty, with my consent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to discuss the constitutional feature of this resolution. I oppose it because, in so far as it does anything, it tarnishes our national honor, and if it affects the legal or peace status at all it is hurtful to the interests and just rights of our country and citizens, and brings aid and comfort only to Germany and German nationals.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] on Saturday said that this resolution was made necessary by the dismal and humiliating failure of the Wilson administration to make peace. The gentleman chose to ignore the fact that the President alone could not make peace; that only the President and the Senate, acting in concert, could make peace. The President negotiated a peace treaty which every other nation but ours, including Germany, has long since ratified. It can not have been wholly bad since it is approved by the statesmen and people of more than 30 nations, including all the great nations of Europe save Russia, and all the leading nations of the western world, including Australia and Canada, save the United States and disordered Mexico. Mr. Speaker, the plausible pretext on which a resolution similar to this was urged and passed by Republicans in May, 1920, was that it was necessary because the Democratic President and Republican Senate were deadlocked and could not agree on the terms of peace, and so could not make a peace treaty in the way clearly authorized and directed by the Constitution. If that pretext was true in 1920, it is not true now since we no longer have Mr. Wilson for President; since the President and Senate are both Republican now. Why have they not made—why do they not now make peace with Germany in an undoubtedly constitutional way?

The justice of Mr. Wilson's appeal in 1918 for the election of a Congress in sympathy with his administration grows clear in the light of events following the Republican victory of that year. Had a Democratic Senate assembled instead of a Republican Senate in May, 1919, the treaty would have been ratified, without reservations or with reservations, and all the great nations, including ours, would have been these last two years working in harmony for the restoration and healing of the world. The nations, with renewed faith and hope, based on absolute harmony and unity of purpose, would have been two full years along the pathway of reconstruction and prosperity. The failure to ratify the peace treaty, with or without reservations, the failure to make peace, was, as the gentleman from Kansas said, dismal, because it was complete; made so by the action of a Republican Senate grown arrogant and bent on the complete destruction of every Wilson or Democratic claim to credit for a successful war and a just peace; and it was humiliating, because by the words and actions of Republican Senators, and one or two Democratic Senators, more bitter and vituperative than Republicans, against the President, it was and is now clear that no treaty which the President could possibly have brought home from the peace table at Versailles would have secured ratification by that Senate. And this for two reasons: First, because of a bitterness never equaled toward the President, and because under his leadership we had fought the war to glorious victory, and the credit of a just and equally glorious peace must not be permitted for personal and political reasons; and, second, any peace made in keeping with our avowed purposes when we entered the war and in conjunction with our allies would of necessity impose mutual and joint obligations on us and them for the preservation of the rights and safety and freedom of the world, and the exaction from Germany of just reparations to us and our allies for her crimes and injuries. With many, a man or a cause defeated is discredited. Obligations that are heavy are easily made odious. The treaty of Versailles has been discredited because its ratification has been defeated, and its obligations are easily made odious because they are real and substantial.

All the purposes we so loudly proclaimed in 1917 are scouted and scorned now. We are not interested in European or world peace or welfare. Even enlightened self-interest fails to move the party in power to assume any obligations for preservation of international justice or human rights outside of the United States. We turn yellow and abandon all the lofty ideals and purposes we once professed and gloried in, and endure without rebuke from the President the shame of having our ambassador in London, Mr. George Harvey, declare to the world that all our professions were lies and that we fought only to save our skins. Few are bold enough to use his words, but many haters of Wilson, I fear, are beginning to receive them with approval. How times change, and men change with them. How sordid selfishness and sordid politics debase all that is noble in men. How they tend to destroy the righteousness that exalteth a nation.

On April 3, 1917, the day after President Wilson delivered his war message to Congress, George Harvey sent to the White House the following telegram of congratulation:

> A great message of patriotism, evidencing masterful leadership based upon mutual faith of the President in his country and of the country in its President. I was confident as one could be, but even so I was not prepared for so splendid a realization. For the Nation, it is glorious; for patriots, inspiring; for the President, noble.

The following paragraphs are from the message referred to by Mr. Harvey, delivered by President Wilson at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress on April 2, 1917:

> American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. * * * Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the Nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion. * * *
> While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear, and make very clear to all the world what our motives and our objects are. * * * I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the 22d of January last; the same that I had in mind when I addressed the Congress on the 3d of February and on the 26th of February. Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles. * * *
> We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included, for the rights of nations great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them. * * *

It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own Governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

Col. Harvey's telegram on April 3, 1917, expressed not only his own sentiments but those of nine-tenths of the people of the United States. The resolution before the House is in keeping with Mr. Harvey's London speech. It shows that the great party, which came into power in 1918 under loud professions of being and having been even more loyal to the war policies and purposes of the President than the Democratic Party, that the party which in 1918 denounced Mr. Wilson as guilty of a gross and slanderous imputation when he asked the people to elect a Congress in sympathy with him, has abandoned all our high purposes, and cares now only that the United States "save its own skin"; that we only secure all the claims and rights possible for ourselves. That it repudiates every obligation and leaves our allies without our aid or cooperation to secure proper and just reparation from Germany, to impose proper and just penalties on her for her crimes, and to make good the high purposes we boasted as to weaker nations and human rights. It seeks only to "save our own skins" and to get all the benefits without bearing any of the burdens stipulated for us in the treaty of Versailles. Is it any wonder that with such a party in control of the Senate the efforts of Mr. Wilson to secure the ratification of any treaty of peace was a dismal and humiliating failure?

Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest doubt that even to-day the Senate of the United States, if the treaty of Versailles were resubmitted to it, can ratify it subject to any reservations it chooses to make, and thereby make a binding treaty of peace with Germany, a treaty which would not abandon our allies or leave them alone to enforce the terms of the armistice which our soldiers, living and dead, helped to wring from Germany.

The Versailles treaty, so far as it affects Germany, has never been criticized by them. They can ratify that part only of the treaty if they choose, and this they would have already done, it seems to me, if they have not decided to abandon our allies and deal separately with Germany. If that is true, then Germany has accomplished her great desire and divided finally and completely her enemies. But if mere pride or hatred of the former President or politics forbid them to make use of any part of the already negotiated treaty, they can still preserve our honor by negotiating a peace with Germany under the terms of the armistice, in which we may still help our allies, as well as ourselves, to secure their and our rights.

More than three months have elapsed since March 4, and no step has been taken by the Republican Party to do either of these things. The President alone can negotiate a treaty, yet he has taken no step to negotiate any treaty singly or in conjunction with our allies. He has been content to express from time to time vague and general and conflicting thoughts, hardly amounting to a purpose on the subject. Sometimes he seems to suggest ratifying the existing treaty with certain reservations. He voted that way when he was Senator. Sometimes he seems to suggest that he might negotiate a new treaty. But he does nothing. Our people grow weary, and in their weariness the Republican Party, uncertain what to do, how to proceed, submit this or the Knox resolution, thinking that our people will gladly accept anything that professes to end the war and settle all its issues. If it did this and was not covered over with shame, I myself would vote for it. It does not end the war; that is ended. It does not settle all its issues or any of its issues, but it is covered over with shame.

But, Mr. Speaker, what about the resolution itself? First, it is the fourth bite the Republican Party has taken at one cherry.

On April 1, 1920, Mr. PORTER, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, introduced H. J. Res. 327, which the House passed. It declared the war at an end, but did not repeal the resolution on which we entered the war. It recognized how that simple declaration might endanger the rights and claims of our Government and people, and so in section 2 it provided that if Germany did not within 45 days notify the President that Germany also had declared the war at an end, and that she waived for herself and her nationals all claims against the United States or their nationals, as stipulated in the treaty of Versailles, then the President should proclaim all commercial intercourse between the two nations prohibited; and it provided heavy penalties against all American citizens who might trade with this nation, with which we were at peace. It was severe on our own people, and might hurt us as much or more than Germany. It made no provision for any indemnities or claims of the United States or of any of our people. Surely, this resolution was impotent; but it passed the House. When it reached the Senate it was scrapped, and the Senate tried its hand on making peace.

The Senate struck out the Porter resolution and substituted for it one drawn by Mr. KNOX. This was bite No. 2 at the cherry. It repealed the resolution of April 6, 1917, under which we fought the war, thereby, in Mr. PORTER'S opinion and in the opinion of the Republican members of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, withdrawing or apologizing to Germany for our declaration of war, as shown in the committee report. It then declared the war at an end.

It rejected Mr. PORTER'S embargo and penalizing sections, but provided that we should hold all the property of Germany or her nationals until by treaty she arranged to satisfy all claims of ours and to waive all claims of Germany or its nationals against us. It also declares we do not waive any rights to anything coming to us under the unratified treaty of Versailles. The Porter resolution relied on trade prohibition, while the Knox substitute relied on our holding German property, about a billion dollars' worth, to persuade Germany to make a treaty we wanted. One can not help thinking of the towering figure of Bismarck when he stood over the French delegates and dictated the terms of peace in 1870, and fancying just how the Kaiser would have made peace had he been victorious.

This Knox substitute passed the Senate and then went back to the House, where it was swallowed and passed, apology to Germany and all, and then went to the President, who vetoed it on May 27, 1920, on the ground that it placed an ineffaceable stain on the gallantry and honor of the United States; that it made peace without exacting of Germany any righting of wrongs done to the peoples whom it attacked and whom we professed it our purpose to aid when we entered the war, or attaining any of the purposes for which we declared we went to war, and because it made a complete surrender of the rights of the United States and severed our relations with our allies so far as Germany was concerned. Thus ended the two resolutions of 1920, which were defended on the ground that they were the only way to make peace, since the President and Senate were hopelessly deadlocked.

March 4, 1921, Mr. Harding was inaugurated. He and the Republican Senate seem also deadlocked.

On April 28, 1921, the Senate passed Senate joint resolution 16. It makes the same apology to Germany for entering the war as did the resolution vetoed May 27, 1920, by repealing the resolution on which we entered the war and then declares the war at an end. But it declares we will hold all German property till Germany makes a treaty with us providing for satisfaction of all our claims, and, in fact, until Germany makes all the concessions we ask, notwithstanding any existing treaty between us and Germany. This was evidently intended to prevent our treaty of 1828 with Germany, which was in force when we went to war, from coming to life when we made peace. It was really an ex parte declaration that we would ignore a treaty which by all the rules of law bound us. In other words, we emulated Germany in making our treaty a scrap of paper.

I am sure our ex parte declaration or reservation can not affect any right of Germany or her nationals under any treaty we had or have with her. All this was taken care of in the treaty of Versailles by Germany agreeing in that treaty that she herself would settle the claims of her citizens whose property we had seized as well as waive all her own claims and pay all the claims of our Government and our citizens. But this treaty, not ratified by us, not binding on us, is surely not binding on Germany. Senate joint resolution 16 says it reserves all the rights of its citizens which were stipulated by the treaty of Versailles, though we have not ratified it. Every man in Congress knows such a reservation is absurd. If any of these resolutions effect a legal status of peace, then under international law all the rights of each nation and its citizens will rest on international law or on existing or binding treaties between the two nations. It is said that in the prospect of this resolution passing, lawyers have been retained already to bring suits for the recovery of property of many German citizens seized by the United States. In like manner our citizens whose property was seized in Germany must go to Germany for relief. A beautiful prospect for thousands of lawsuits and rich pickings for hundreds of lawyers opens up.

Since April 28 Senate joint resolution 16, having passed the Senate, has been here in this House waiting for action. Mr. PORTER is again at the bat. He can not stomach its apology to Germany by its repeal of our war resolution, and so he reports the present substitute for it which we are considering. This is the fourth and last effort, I trust, to solve this German peace and treaty problem by congressional resolution. This resolution is shorter, and that much better, than any of its predecessors. It does not repeal our declaration of a state of war begun by Germany, and is that much cleaner than the resolution vetoed by Mr. Wilson and the Knox resolution of this session.

Here is the Porter substitute for Senate joint resolution 16:

That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States of America by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

SEC. 2. That in making this declaration, and as a part of it, there are expressly reserved to the United States of America and its nationals any and all rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages, together with the right to enforce the same, to which it or they have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof; or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States of America by reason of its participation in the war or to which its nationals have thereby become rightfully entitled; or which, under the treaty of Versailles, have been stipulated for its or their benefit; or to which it is entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers; or to which it is entitled by virtue of an act or acts of Congress; or otherwise.

Mr. ROGERS, the ranking Republican on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, discussing this resolution, says:

Mr. Speaker, it takes two to make a war. Similarly, it takes two to end a war. The passage of a peace resolution by the Congress of the United States is a domestic act. The action is unilateral and not bilateral; therefore in and of itself it can have no international force or validity.

To that extent he says he agrees with the Democrats on the committee who oppose the resolution. He then argues, however, that if Germany should pass a resolution like this to the extent of declaring the war at an end, that would establish by mutual action an actual and legal status of peace. If that be true, it would be a peace without any terms or conditions binding on the United States or on Germany, and if a treaty is hereafter negotiated between them it will be a treaty between two nations equal in every way, and Germany may utterly reject section 2 of the resolution, which seeks to reserve all American rights st ulated in the armistice or the treaty of Versailles. The resolution, therefore, by the confession of its proponents, accomplishes nothing, but it is an excuse for doing nothing. The party in power have not the nerve or capacity to make a just and honorable peace. This resolution seeks only to delude our people into believing they have done so. Republicans are hopelessly incompetent to deal with the situation, and any Democrat who votes with them for this resolution is only helping them to pull their chestnuts out of the fire; helping them to fool the people; not helping our people to secure any right or any benefit or betterment of our condition. The resolution consists of two sections. Section 1 declares the war at an end. That is a truth, which is neither added to nor taken from by the declaration. The President declared it first. The declaration accomplishes nothing; it effects no settlement or agreement of or about any matter, thing, question, claim, right, or wrong growing out of or connected with the war. We will appoint no representative of our Government to go to Germany, nor will Germany appoint any representative to come to us under or by virtue of it. It does not affect our trade or trade rights in Germany or those of Germany here. These can only be affected by a treaty when one is made. Under the actual peace existing and recognized by both countries our international trade is as free and untrammeled as it will or can be under this section.

The only possible effect of section 1 is that we may be estopped by it from assuming the position of victors in negotiating a treaty with Germany hereafter and be compelled to treat as with an equal in all respects. I said the war in fact had ended. Perhaps that is not quite correct. We have our troops still occupying German territory under the armistice. It may be that under this resolution we must at once withdraw those troops. If and when we do that we will be at peace absolutely, legally and technically, treaty or no treaty. The President has had the power to order those troops home all during these three last months. It may be that, not having the confidence in the rightfulness of such a course or the courage to pursue it, he wants this resolution to strengthen his backbone. I do not know.

Nations may go to war with a declaration or without declaring it, as Germany did with us and with Belgium. In either case there are two ways of making peace, one by a peace agreement or treaty; the other by a voluntary and mutual cessation of all war acts. Until now the United States and Germany have not made peace in either of these ways. Germany has quit every war activity toward us, but we still have our troops on her soil, as I understand it under an armistice which binds Germany if we insist on it to bear all our expenses of maintaining them there, amounting to some $250,000,000. If we now remove them without a further agreement with Germany, that sum, together with all other claims of our Government or people against Germany, will be left to future negotiations between two equal sovereign States.

Section 2 of the resolution is more futile and useless than section 1.

"In making this declaration and as part of it, there are expressly reserved to the United States of America and its nationals all rights," and so forth, "with rights to enforce same"—"to which they are entitled under the armistice," and so forth. If that reservation means anything it means that the loud declaration of peace does not go at all until we have enforced all our rights of all kinds whatsoever growing out of the war or otherwise, so that the whole declaration seems to be a sham and a fraud, made to save the President's face, he having declared in the campaign he would have such a resolution passed or made to meet a widespread clamor for an ending of all war questions and to fool the people into thinking that this resolution settles them or some of them. In truth, it settles none of them, but if acting under it the President withdraws our troops from the Rhine, all things between us and Germany will be further than ever from any settlement.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party have been since 1918 powerful enough to thwart every effort of President Wilson to bring back peace and good understanding to the world, but they have no leadership to fill his place. They have no definite, concrete policies or principles for the guidance of the ship of state in domestic or foreign affairs. Their every step is hesitating; their every policy is a makeshift. They do not even see through a glass darkly.

My greatest prayer is not that they may be hindered but that they may be helped; that they may cease to be blinded by partisanship and find wisdom.

God grant that our weary and stricken country and a sick and wounded world may find healing in a dedication of all that in them is to higher ideals, nobler lives! May we in domestic affairs find faith in justice and equity and in international affairs go forward to the performance of our whole duty toward all nations, whatever the burdens may be, so that our children and the whole world in future generations shall not say we were weighed in the balance and found wanting but must rise up and call us blessed.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, it ought to be apparent to Members of the law-making body, as it is apparent to everyone else in the country, that an impasse has long since been reached in the matter of concluding the proposed treaty of peace with the nations with whom we were lately at war. As a result of this condition, there remains to be made an official transition from the status of a war ended to a peace restored. The object of this resolution is formally and officially to take this step by the enactment of this plain and simple legislative declaration which is framed to meet the recommendation of the President in his recent message to Congress, wherein he stated his readiness to approve a declaratory resolution of Congress to establish a state of peace with the qualifications essential to protect our rights.

The pending resolution does precisely what the President recommended. In scope and purpose it goes no further than it ought to go in securing the ends desired.

Gentlemen who oppose this measure deny that it is within the power of Congress to enact legislation declaring the state of war at an end, and assert that the bill is a usurpation of power which under the Constitution does not belong to this body. Their contention seems to be that once Congress has declared a state of war to exist it has exhausted its power, save in the matter of furnishing the means to carry on the war; that all authority over what is to follow a cessation of hostilities is exclusively swallowed up by the treaty-making power, whether that power functions speedily, successfully, and conclusively, or whether it fails to function altogether. If this doctrine were the correct one, then all discussion upon the proposition now before us should be indefinitely postponed, and the problem of peace deferred until the treaty, twice rejected already, or some other treaty shall have been finally accepted and made the supreme law of the land.

I am not in accord with this position, for I am not aware of any language in the Constitution which restrains the Congress from doing what this legislation proposes to accomplish. Gentlemen seem seriously to contend that because the Constitution gives to the President and the Senate the right to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, therefore this legislation is an assumption of power which the House of Representatives does not possess. When this pending measure was considered by the members of the committee who voted to report it to the House, this phase of the question was carefully examined and, I believe, the resolution here presented is so restricted in language and application that it can not offend even the most critical specialist in the perplexing study of constitutional limitations.

Gentlemen who are responsible for reporting this resolution to the House, and I am one of them, disclaim any right on the part of the House to participate in the negotiation of a treaty. They do not admit, however, that the House has not the right or that it is not a pressing public duty to deal here with a plain reality which has come into existence after war has long since ceased and the failure to conclude a treaty has been made plain to everybody. [Applause on the Republican side.] What is the reality which confronts us? It is the reality of peace—a condition which has prevailed for nearly three years, and this resolution is but a plain recognition of the fact which no one can deny and which all are ready to proclaim.

The pending resolution is not an encroachment on the treaty-making power. Nowhere can you find in it, either expressed or implied, any plan or purpose of negotiation. If it proposed mutual action or interchange of terms; if it provided for any regulation by compromise or compact; if it laid down conditions for the adjustment of differences between this country and Germany, there would be some ground for the contention of those who dissent from this procedure; but there is nothing of this character to be found anywhere in the resolution. It does not contain or even suggest any declaration calculated to put Congress in the unlawful position of attempting to initiate or direct the foreign policy of the country. It is confined solely to the proposition of ending the technical state of war with the German and Austrian Governments, reserving all the rights and privileges we now possess or to which we are entitled by reason of our participation in the war. In this resolution Congress is not addressing Germany or any other nation, nor is it dictating to the President any line of policy for him to follow.

Termination of war is not a matter that is regulated by the organic laws of the country. It is regulated by rules of international law which assert that war may sometimes be terminated by a simple cessation of hostilities with no accompanying agreement on the part of the warring nations. Such is the present situation. The state of actual warfare ceased to exist two and one-half years ago, and by this resolution we officially recognize the patent fact and propose that the United States shall end upon its own initiative the anomalous situation of being any longer technically at war while actually at peace.

What constructive end is accomplished by the passage of this resolution? It throws off the restraints imposed by the technical state of war, and leaves this country free to enter any agreement it may desire with any other nation or nations. Pending the arrival at an agreement, diplomatic and consular relations with the enemy may be restored and American traders may resume in unrestricted measure their trade relations with all the world, without being further hampered by the limitations of presidential permits. American business is entitled to the full benefits of such relations.

In the discussion which this proposition has evoked it has been stated—and the minority report reiterates it—that even if we have the power we should not do what is here proposed, for the reason that the President can make better terms under a technical war status than under a legal peace status. This is a play on words, mere quibble, and can not be offered as argument. It has been asserted, too, that the enactment of this measure will endanger and leave unsettled several important questions, such as title to ships taken during the war and property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian. The resolution covers these matters. One of its main purposes is to hold in statu quo whatever rights we have or may be entitled to claim against Germany. Nothing is therefore imperiled. On the contrary, all these rights and advantages are reserved until our relations with the German Government are finally adjusted.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will.

Mr. COCKRAN. Would not that condition exist by the mere adoption of a declaration that the war is at an end without these specific statements?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am not so sure the gentleman is right about that. I have heard the gentleman say either section 2 is a treaty or it is superfluous. I do not believe it is a treaty. There is no question in my mind that the United States, even though it is not a party to a contract that is made by other nations or individuals, can have reserved for it certain rights, advantages, and stipulations under that contract, and what we propose to do here is merely to reserve those rights. Maybe this action is superfluous, though I do not exactly think so; at any rate, I can see no harm in including these reservations in the resolution. [Applause.]

Furthermore, it has been said by those who dissent from this procedure that the passage of this resolution will, in effect, be an abandonment of the Allies. The proposed legislation does not and can not detach us from consultation or deliberation with any of these powers. It simply puts us upon a legal peace status toward Germany—a status such as the allied powers now occupy. They have already made peace with Germany. Can we not also make a move toward peace, which affects us solely in our domestic relations? Pass this resolution and we shall have a state of peace without a treaty of peace. With this much accomplished, there is nothing to hinder the President from proceeding to effectuate a satisfactory settlement. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Nothing proposed by this resolution can endanger the settlement to be made. It is difficult, therefore, to perceive how any right or association of ours can possibly be prejudiced by its passage. At all events and under all circumstances we may at least feel assured that in the final reckoning America will exact nothing but what is fair and reasonable, and that our differences will be adjusted only after due examination of all the facts and arguments upon which a just, impartial, and honorable determination must depend. Germany must see the advantage of a settlement based upon such solid ground and accordingly come to a final agreement without any unnecessary delay. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it has been said we are living in a new day—a time of new conditions—an era in which old things are passing away. Warrant for that statement may be found in a situation which has constrained the Republican administration to present to Congress the Knox joint resolution, to make and declare peace with our late enemies, by an act of Congress rather than by the constitutional means of a treaty, and thus set a precedent which has never before been set in the history of the Republic.

In April, 1920, a similar resolution passed the House, but before it was conceived or adopted it was known that it could not properly nor would receive Executive approval. Certain of that result, its proponents, desperately driven by partisan pretense and expedience, sought to induce in the minds of the people of America the belief that they were sincerely undertaking to bring into being a state of peace and were thwarted in that purpose by the President. It was then confessed that never before in the political history of the United States since the adoption of the Constitution had Congress undertaken to make peace with a foreign power.

The present situation strikingly illustrates how vicious and harmful a precedent established in error may become. A year ago political strategy dictated a departure from constitutional processes. Maneuvered by the stress of circumstance into a renewed advocacy of such a course, during a heated presidential campaign, the Republican Party, that it may seem to vindicate its prior adoption of error and to mask its former insincerity, feels compelled now to pursue the same pathway, though it leads to shame.

On April 8, 1920, in this Chamber, I sought in a carefully prepared speech to demonstrate by reference to the Constitution, international law, and court decisions the incompetence of Congress either to make peace or negotiate a treaty of peace with a foreign power. Neither time nor inclination will allow reiteration. Constitutional difficulties avail little with a maddened majority driven by partisan whip and spur.

While I shall not now venture to discuss the constitutional questions exhaustively, I desire to suggest the basis of the lack of authority in Congress to make peace or conclude a treaty. Section 1 of the resolution is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States of America by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

It has been suggested that Congress having declared war, "the same power which has the right to declare and carry on war would seem naturally to be the proper power to make and conclude a treaty of peace." The language is from Kent; but the same author proceeds as follows:

But the disposition of this power will depend upon the local constitution of every nation; and it sometimes happens that the power of making peace is committed to a body of men who have not the power to make war. (a) In Sweden after the death of Charles the Twelfth the King could declare war without the consent of the National Diet, but he made peace in conjunction with the Senate. (b) So by the Constitution of the United States the President, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, may make peace, but it is reserved to Congress to declare war. This provision in our Constitution is well adapted (as will be shown more fully hereafter) to unite, in the negotiation and conclusion of treaties, the advantage of talents, experience, stability, and a comprehensive knowledge of national interest with the requisite secrecy and dispatch.

In the Constitutional Convention the power to declare peace was expressly denied to Congress.

On August 17, 1787, the convention debated the clause appearing in the tentative draft as "to make war," and the following transpired, as will appear in Elliot's Debates:

FRIDAY, AUGUST 17, 1787.

On the clause, "to make war."

On the motion to insert "declare," in place of "make," it was agreed to: Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia—ayes, 8; New Hampshire—no, 1; Massachusetts, absent.

Mr. Pinckney's motion to strike out the whole clause was disagreed to without call of States.

Mr. Butler moved to give the legislature the power of peace, as they were to have that of war.

Mr. Gerry seconds him. Eight Senators may possibly exercise the power, if vested in that body, and 14 if all should be present, and may consequently give up part of the United States. The Senate are more liable to be corrupted by an enemy than the whole legislature.

On the motion for adding "and peace," after "war," it was unanimously negatived.

Adjourned.

Commenting on the transaction, Mr. Storey said:

In the convention, in the first draft of the Constitution the power was given merely "to make war." It was subsequently, and not without some struggle, altered to its present form. It was proposed to add the power "to make peace"; but this was unanimously rejected upon the plain ground that it more properly belonged to the treaty-making power. The experience of Congress under the Confederation of the difficulties attendant upon vesting the treaty-making power in a large legislative body was too deeply felt to justify the hazard of another experiment.

Dr. William Rawle, in his view of the Constitution (Philadelphia, 1829, pp. 110–111), remarks:

Treaties, by which peace is completely restored, may, as already shown, be made by the President and Senate alone, without the concurrence and against the will of the House of Representatives.

It has been made a subject of doubt whether the power to make war and peace should not be the same, and why a smaller part of the Government should be intrusted with the latter than the former. Sufficient reasons may certainly be assigned for the distinction. Peace is seldom effected without preparatory discussions, often of length and difficulty, the conduct of which, of course, belongs only to the President and Senate.

Abundant authority may be quoted, but I shall not multiply citations. Reference is made to them in my remarks in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5352, April 8, 1920. All will admit that the Constitution vests the treaty-making power in the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." None will contend that Congress is authorized to end war by the making of a treaty. When confronted by a constitutional objection of such unquestioned soundness, the only escape for gentlemen urging the resolution, lies in a flat denial that a treaty is proposed to be made by Congress. It is not, however, contended by gentlemen on the Republican side that the passage of this resolution will be effectual, because the President is quoted as saying, and the leaders in the Senate are quoted as saying, and gentlemen on the floor of this House have already said, that even after this resolution shall have been adopted a treaty of peace must be entered into by the President with the German Government.

Assuming for the moment that Congress possesses the power to do what is proposed, which, of course, I deny, is it wise or safe for our interests to do so? What good can be accomplished? What harm will result? What are the ends sought? What useful purpose will it accomplish for the people of the United States? What are the arguments urged a year ago to support such a plan?

First. The excuse was offered that the President and the Senate could not agree on terms of peace, and that that constitutional agency having failed, Congress should exercise a power never before claimed for it. That claim has no support now. The President and both Houses of Congress are in entire accord. Any treaty which the President might make would probably receive the consent of a willing Senate. Such a pretext can not now bottom an unconstitutional course by the Congress.

What was the next argument? The desire for peace, the ending of war, the return of the Army from Germany, were next urged as sufficient ground to support the action.

Mr. Speaker, fighting closed in November, 1918, and has never been resumed. Hostilities have come to an end. The armies have returned to the United States and been demobilized, except the forces in the occupied territory of Germany. The troops now in Germany may be recalled by the President as constitutional Commander in Chief whenever he may see fit. If you want them returned, let the President bring them home. That bogy no longer stalks abroad to affright the nervous and the timid.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not want to decline, and I think I am coming to what the gentleman has in mind in a minute.

What was the third excuse? A year ago the cry went out that peace by resolution must be had to restore trade with Germany. That was and is a specious but hollow appeal. The United States has for more than a year been trading with Germany to the extent of her ability to buy. I hold in my hand a letter from Secretary of State Hughes, under date of May 5, 1921, stating that there exists no restriction of trade with Germany except the restriction against the importation into the United States of dyes, certain chemicals, and coal-tar products from Germany. Why does that restriction exist? That exists because the Republican emergency tariff bill, recently enacted, provides for that restriction. Fancy Republicans urging this resolution that we may trade with Germany, when the only impediment to such trade was imposed by a tariff embargo on German dyes and chemicals. Listen to the letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 5, 1921.

Hon. TOM CONNALLY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CONNALLY: I have your letter of May 3, 1921, inquiring as to what, if any, restrictions are now imposed on trade between the United States and Germany or Austria.

In reply I take pleasure in informing you that no restrictions are now imposed on trade between the United States and Germany and Austria except in the case of property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, and of sodium nitrate, synthetic organic drugs, synthetic organic chemicals, dyes, and dyestuffs, including crudes and intermediates, all products, whether embraced in the above or not, derived directly or indirectly from coal tar, including crude intermediate and finished or partly finished products, mixtures, and compounds of coal-tar products.

I am, my dear Mr. CONNALLY,
Very sincerely, yours,
CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Not now.

Here is a letter from Secretary of Commerce Hoover, of May 6, 1921, relating to the volume of trade with Germany. It also discloses that no restriction is placed on exports to Germany. It declares that for 1920 exports to Germany amounted to $311,437,377 and imports into the United States from Germany amounted to $88,836,380, as against, for 1919, exports of $92,761,314 and imports of $10,608,141. For 1913, exports to Germany were, in round numbers, $351,000,000. For the first three months of 1921 they amounted to $118,934,738. At that rate they will amount to more than $450,000,000 for 1921, a greater sum than for 1913, before war had interrupted our trade. We are selling Germany now more exports than before the war. Listen to Secretary Hoover's letter:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 6, 1921.

Hon. TOM CONNALLY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: With reference to your letter of May 3, I am inclosing herewith a statement regarding the trade of the United States with Germany, prepared by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which I hope will be of assistance to you.

Yours, faithfully,
HERBERT HOOVER,
Secretary of Commerce.

(Inclosure 34651.)

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, May 6, 1921.

In reply refer to 17.

Memorandum for Secretary of Commerce:

In reply to letter from Hon. TOM CONNALLY, Representative in Congress, under date of May 3, regarding the import and export trade of United States with Germany and restrictions, if any, on the trade.

There are quoted below the total values of imports and exports of merchandise into and from the United States in its trade with Germany during the calendar years 1919, 1920, and the months of January, February, and March, 1921:

	Imports.	Exports.
1919	$10,608,141	$92,761,314
1920	88,836,280	311,437,377
1921:
January	4,630,381	48,812,037
February	4,952,278	39,619,713
March	7,367,780	30,502,988
	16,950,439	118,934,738

There are no restrictions placed on the exportations from the United States to Germany. The imports of sodium nitrate, synthetic organic drugs and chemicals, dyes and dyestuffs, including crudes and intermediates, and all products whether embraced in the above or not which are derived, directly or indirectly, from coal tar, including intermediates and finished products or partly finished products, mixtures, or compounds of coal tar are subject to restrictions. The regulations governing the importations of these commodities are issued by the War Trade Board Section of the Department of State, and if Representative CONNALLY is desirous of securing a copy of these regulations it is suggested that he communicate with that office.

J. HOHN,
Chief Division of Statistics.

Germany is gradually recovering her power to buy, and exports from the United States are growing. A few days ago I read in the Galveston News of recent arrangements to send large shipments of cotton to Germany. England, on account of the coal strike, is taking little cotton, but Germany is beginning to purchase larger and larger amounts. The greatest impediment to trade in cotton with Germany is the Republican protective tariff, which prevents her from shipping goods to pay us for our cotton and raw materials. This act will not repeal the tariff. If so, it would not be here.

Her trade is reviving. Her ability to buy is coming back. All she needs is money with which to purchase. This bill will not coin a single gold mark. We are now selling her all the goods she can pay for. The trade pretense is too frail a nail upon which to hang an argument.

Oh, but gentlemen said a year ago, and they are repeating it now, that we must pass this resolution in order to get rid of these irritating and annoying war laws. The most appealing of all contentions made a year ago was that the war laws should be repealed. On the 3d of March, 1921, a joint resolution of Congress was approved by President Wilson, H. J. Res. 382, that wiped off the statute books every single war law that was written there, except a few laws which a Republican Congress, which passed that statute, refused to wipe off the books. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They were terminated by a resolution of simple repeal without a declaration of peace, and yet you come now and say that you want to pass this resolution to repeal laws which you refused to repeal only three months ago. There is no firm ground there upon which to stand. The word "peace" has a tremendous psychological appeal. Many seem to think that this resolution will produce some magical result. But what can it actually do in fact? Let us strip it of the words and phrases by which it is concealed and see what it really can do. The resolution will not end the fighting. It is already ended. The troops in Germany may be brought home at the pleasure of the President. It will not restore trade with Germany—it is already restored so far as she is able to buy. It will not repeal the war laws—they have already been repealed.

What, gentlemen of the House, remains to be settled and determined as issues and outgrowths of the war? What is there then that remains to be done to restore the United States to the prewar status? All that remains is the adjustment of the rights of the United States Government and American citizens with the German Government. What are those claims and rights that must be settled? American ships were sunk and American citizens killed on the public highways of the sea. Claims for reparation must be adjusted. Many millions of dollars of property of American citizens in Germany was seized and held by the German Government. Claims affecting the sinking of American ships, claims for the loss of American lives, American property in Europe seized or damaged or destroyed by Germany, German ships and German property in the United States that were seized by the Government are the questions remaining to be settled. And what do we find about that?

Senate Document No. 419 (66th Cong., 3d sess.) contains a report by the Secretary of State to the President, of date March 2, 1921, respecting claims of American citizens against Germany as disclosed by the records of the State Department. I quote from that report certain tables and statements disclosing the state of such claims. I shall not read the tables in detail, but will place them in the RECORD for your information.

CLAIMS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS AGAINST GERMANY.

Claims and losses which may be readily classified are herein set forth in summary, indicating the items into which the claims and losses may be conveniently classified, the number of claims which has been filed, the number which is prospective, and the amounts of the claims and the alleged losses.

Claims in which no amounts have yet been stated 37
Statements of losses and statements concerning property in Germany in which no amounts have been given. Many of these may become claims, particularly those based upon submarine warfare 854

The items included in the foregoing summary which comprise the principal part of the amounts claimed or losses alleged are loss of life, personal injuries, vessels sunk in submarine warfare, cargoes lost in submarine warfare, insurance paid, and premiums paid on war-risk insurance. Further information regarding these losses and claims is set forth below under their respective headings. In the statements which follow the term "prewar" relates to losses which occurred prior to the entry of the United States into the war. The term "belligerent" relates to losses which occurred during the participation of the United States in the war.

Statements of alleged losses and claims arising from loss of life.

The Treasury Department has notified the Department of State that it is desired to make claim to reimburse the Government of the United States for losses paid on business written by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

* * * * * * *

Property belonging to many Americans was seized by the German Army at the outbreak of the war, both in Germany and in the countries invaded by the German Army. A great deal of valuable American property in Belgium was either seized for military purposes or damaged or destroyed during the German occupation of Belgium. Much valuable American property available for war purposes, such as automobiles, machinery, and supplies, was promptly taken by the German Army. American property in northern France was also lost or damaged.

Among the heaviest prewar losses of this character were those sustained by several American corporations which had valuable property interests in Rumania.

GENERAL LOSSES OF THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

Various items have been communicated to the department as losses sustained by the Government of the United States as a result of the war which are not included in the general summary of losses and claims as set forth above. These items may be briefly summarized as follows:

	Prewar.	Belligerent.
Cargoes, United States Government owned (see Exhibits 5, 6, and 7)		$36,185,890
War vessels of United States Navy (see Exhibit 5)		12,938,394
Armed vessels requisitioned as naval auxiliaries (see Exhibit 5)		1,566,964
Department of Labor expenses in caring for German officers and sailors		900,000
Expenses of United States Navy resume	$26,477
War Department expenses in caring for prisoners of war in the United States		3,305,300
Expenses Department of Justice in handling enemy aliens in United States		1,032,656
United States Navy expenses in restoring damaged interned German ships		6,951,285
United States Navy demurrage charges in re damaged German vessels		8,702,433

AMERICAN INTERESTS IN GERMANY.

The treatment of American-owned property of various descriptions in Germany is a possible source of further claims. Several thousand American citizens have filed with the department statements describing their property in Germany and giving an estimate of its value. An abstract of information furnished the department regarding American interests in Germany follows:

Character of property:	Estimated values.
Real estate	$10,271,449.48
Debts, including accounts and bills receivable	29,267,147.27
Securities	67,183,750.55
Deposits	30,951,540.20
Miscellaneous property	49,910,371.10
Inheritances, real, personal, and miscellaneous	3,563,079.16
Total	191,147,346.76

By an ordinance of January 11, 1920, various war measures adopted by the German Government relating to enemy property in Germany were repealed.

* * * * * * * *

Consequently, while American citizens, since January 11, 1920, have been able to obtain the possession of real estate and certain classes of personal property which had been sequestrated by the German Government, they have been unable to obtain the release of credits, cash, and deposits.

The amount of claims which may be expected to result from sequestration of American property in Germany is as yet uncertain.

Losses by American prisoners of war: By reference from the War Department, some 618 cases in which American prisoners of war lost property in Germany or suffered other injuries or losses while prisoners have been brought to the attention of the Department of State. The losses submitted by the War Department were compiled from data contained in the affidavits of the American military prisoners who were held in various prison camps and hospitals in Germany. In addition to the complaints regarding loss of personal property, other grounds of complaint are cruelty, neglect, lack of food and medicine, ill treatment, insanitary living conditions, and enforced labor. These cases may be summarized as follows:

Number of cases in which value of property is reported	296
Total value of property lost as reported	$12,560.08
Cases in which miscellaneous injuries are reported but no amounts of claim or loss alleged	464
Cases involving loss of property in which estimates or statements are incomplete	116

Gentlemen of the House, not to mention the untold millions of Government property destroyed, claims of American citizens against Germany of more than $221,000,000 and 672,000,000 lei (Rumanian coin of unknown American value) remain unsettled.

That does not include any claims of the United States for the loss of Shipping Board vessels or for pay of soldiers in the Army of occupation, or any other governmental claims. But there are $221,000,000 of private claims of American citizens. Are you going to pass this resolution and declare a state of peace and abandon hundreds of American citizens to their fate to prosecute their own claims against the German Government? Somebody has got to pay them. If the German Government does not pay them, will you gentlemen vote $221,000,000 out of the United States Treasury to pay them? We very properly refused to permit the Allies to repudiate their debts to us. Will you gentlemen be more generous with Germany than you were with the Allies and give her an acquittance and remission of her obligations to pay $221,000,000 to American citizens?

The United States has made no claim nor will make any claim for indemnities to cover military expenses during the combat period. We were not fighting for gain or conquest, but under the terms of the armistice, Germany is to reimburse the United States for the expenses of the Army of occupation in Germany. Many millions are long past due. A declaration of peace will automatically end the armistice and may endanger that claim.

What else do we find? We find there is approximately $190,000,000 of American property located in Germany. Much of that property was sequestered by the German Government, and the German Government to this date has failed and refused to restore to American citizens their cash or credits in Germany. What else do we find? The United States, acting under its rights as a belligerent, sequestered and now holds the property of enemy aliens. The seizure was authorized only by a state of war.

The office of the Alien Property Custodian informs me that he has in his custody now approximately $400,000,000 belonging to enemy aliens, which was sequestered during the war. This property was not confiscated; it was merely sequestered in order to keep it from going to the aid of the enemy. The Shipping Board informs me that it now holds 40 former German ships of a total tonnage of 352,887 tons—40 German ships, 16 cargo and 24 passenger vessels. Those ships mostly belong not to the German Government but to private German corporations or citizens.

My fellow American citizens—and I speak to you to-day not purely as partisans, but as citizens of this great Republic, and as men charged with a terrific responsibility in these premises—what do we find with reference to those things that remain to be settled? Now, can this resolution settle them? They can only be settled by negotiation, by going into the mass of details to separate the various kinds of claims for damages, for loss of life and property, for restitution of property, and by the ascertainment of questions of fact. To secure restitution of American property held in Germany, to acquire the right to appropriate German property in the hands of the United States to the payment of reparation claims of our citizens involves stipulation that can only be properly and intelligently ascertained by diplomatic negotiation. It may require the establishment of tribunals or commissions to fix and determine claims.

What do gentlemen say? They say that a treaty must still be negotiated after this resolution passes.

The Knox resolution assumes that a treaty will be made. It undertakes to reserve American rights under the treaty of Versailles until a treaty can be negotiated, and so forth. Then, if that be true, what purpose or what benefit will this resolution produce? What useful office can it fill? Why, the Secretary of State and the President in the case of Mexico refuse to recognize her until she enters into a treaty, but in the case of Germany they make peace with her first and talk about a treaty afterwards. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What may result? By the passage of this resolution, if it means anything, we shall immediately be at peace.

Why does not the President negotiate a treaty, which he must make now or later? Certainly a declaration of peace by Congress can not make his task easier. To my mind it will surely make his duty harder.

What will confront him and the country? If this measure be effective, the legal status will be that of peace.

There will then be no alien enemy. There will be then no German enemy. We shall stand on an equality before the world. The two Governments and their nationals and the rights of each must be regarded in the light of a legal state of peace. And what will the President do? The President will undertake to negotiate a treaty with Germany to settle matters arising from war. He may propose to retain alien property until American claims are paid, and Germany will reply to the President—or if she does not you are providing that she may reply to the President—"Why, my dear Mr. President, we are at peace. You have already solemnly said that we are at peace. I have no right in time of peace to turn over the property of my citizens to you to satisfy a war claim which terminated automatically with the end of the war."

At the very threshold the President may be met with that argument.

Already it has been hinted that Germany will claim rights under the treaty with the United States of 1828. In 1799 the United States made a treaty with Prussia. Article 23 of that treaty reads as follows:

> If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestaton or hindrance, and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and in general all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employments, and shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed, nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall, but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

In 1828 another treaty was made and article 12 thereof revived and extended articles 23, 24, and others of the treaty of 1799. It will be noted that by the express terms of the treaty it was to be effective in time of war as well as of peace. The State Department recognizes that that treaty was in force when we entered the war.

Before the expiration of nine months after the war was declared the United States seized German property—the property of German merchants. We molested their property and impounded it under the trading with the enemy act. But it may be said that war abrogated the treaty. That would not prevent Germany from asserting the contrary. The assertion of it, peace having been declared, must result in embarrassment and leave a source of friction for the future.

But wise gentlemen on the Committee on Foreign Affairs will say that war abrogated the treaty. Let us see if it does. Do not forget that Germany knows what is in that treaty. Do not forget that she will recall it to your attention after this resolution passes. I feel warranted in calling it to your attention now, because I want you to know what you are doing when you pass this resolution. Will she fail to point to that clause of article 24 of the Prussian treaty reading as follows:

> And it is declared that neither the pretense that war dissolves all treaties, nor any other whatever, shall be considered as annulling or suspending this and the next preceding article; but, on the contrary, that the state of war is precisely that for which they are provided, and during which they are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged articles in the law of nature and nations.

On the other hand, without a declaration of peace until a treaty is made, the President, on behalf of the United States, can without difficulty adjust to his satisfaction the many issues, claims, and reparations that arose from the war. He may dictate his own terms. As a belligerent we have a right to retain alien property until Germany settles with our citizens.

In addition to what the treaty of 1828 provides, may not Germany contend that under international law the coming of formal peace revives the rights of alien enemies to claim their property, even though it has been sequestered by the State during the war?

Hall, on International Law, in discussing the effects of a treaty of peace, says:

> In a general way it revives all private rights, and restores the remedies which have been suspended during the war; contracts, for example, are revived between private persons if they are not of such a kind as to be necessarily put an end to by war, and if their fulfillment has not been rendered impossible by such acts of a belligerent Government as the confiscation of debts due by subjects to those of its enemy, the courts also are reopened for the enforcement of claims of every kind.

With reference to the seizure of alien-enemy property, it is said:

> Property belonging to an enemy which is found by a belligerent within his own jurisdiction, except property entering territorial waters after the commencement of war, may be said to enjoy a practical immunity from confiscation; but its different kinds are not protected by customs of equal authority, and although seizure would always now be looked upon with extreme disfavor, it would be unsafe to declare that it is not generally within the bare rights of war.

Recourse is not restricted to text writers. Federal judicial authority is at hand.

During the War of the Revolution many of the States enacted laws, similar to the trading with the enemy act, under which the property of British subjects was sequestered and held by the State. In 1783 a treaty was concluded containing a clause providing that British subjects should not suffer any impediment to the collection of British debts.

The State of Georgia instituted an original proceeding in the Supreme Court of the United States to enjoin the payment by a citizen of that State of a debt due to Brailsford, a British subject, on the theory that the debt had been sequestered and had thereby become the property of Georgia. The case was submitted to a jury, which was instructed as to the law by Chief Justice Jay, in part as follows:

> We are also of opinion that the debts due to Brailsford, a British subject, residing in Great Britain, were by the statute of Georgia subjected not to confiscation but only to sequestration, and therefore that his right to recover them revived at the peace, both by the law of nations and the treaty of peace. (Georgia v. Brailsford, 3 Dallas, 1.)

Bearing in mind the treaty of 1828 with Germany and the possible contention that it was terminated by the war, the decision of the Supreme Court in Society, and so forth, versus New Haven, 8 Wheaton, 464, is of interest:

> But there is a still more decisive answer to this objection, which is that the termination of a treaty can not divest rights of property already vested under it.
>
> If real estate be purchased or secured under a treaty, it would be most mischievous to admit that the extinguishment of the treaty extinguished the right to such estate. In truth, it no more affects such rights than the repeal of a municipal law affects rights acquired under it. * * *
>
> We think therefore that treaties stipulating for permanent rights, and general arrangements, and professing to aim at perpetuity, and to deal with the case of war as well as of peace, do not cease on the occurrence of war, but are at most only suspended while it lasts; and unless they are waived by the parties, or new and repugnant stipulations are made, they revive in their operation at the return of peace.

Vattel, Chitty's edition 1857, page 322, states the rule:

He who declares war does not confiscate the immovable property possessed in his country by his enemy's subjects. By permitting them to purchase and possess such property he has in that respect admitted them into the number of his subjects. But the income may be sequestrated in order to prevent its being remitted to the enemy's country.

Where is the man who doubts that German citizens will demand the return of their property? Are there not hundreds of claims for such return now pending with the Alien Property Custodian? If Germany hesitates to perform obligations which she has solemnly assumed, will she be timid in asserting claims that possess the color of lawful rights? So that by the treaty of 1828 as well as the law of nations the moment this country declares peace every German alien may go into court, and will have the right to go into court, and demand the return of his part of the $400,000,000 of property held by the Alien Property Custodian. We have the right to retain that $400,000,000 and say to Germany, "We hold it in pledge to offset your damages due to American citizens in the sum of $221,000,000." Will you pass this resolution and run the risk of surrendering the position which the United States may occupy at the council table?

"Oh, but" they say, "we can attend to that later." Who doubts, gentlemen, but that after this resolution passes the United States will deal with Germany not as a victor, but as an equal? When she goes to the council table I want my country to be in a position to absolutely dictate the terms of peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to give your and my President the power to settle these matters in the interest of the people of the United States. I do not want him to be humiliated in dealing with an enemy over whom we have triumphed. America should be able to exact as a victor in war into which she was forced, what she was unable to exact while she was yet at peace. I shall never vote to make my country an humble mendicant, cringing and fawning before the enemy she has conquered, to secure unquestioned rights as a matter of grace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

With peace formally declared may not Germany and her nationals demand: Give back my ships! Give back my property—my stocks and bonds—my moneys and my lands!

What will you say to American claimants to justify your course?

"Oh," the gentlemen on the majority side say, "section 2 takes care of these things. Section 2 reserves all the rights we have." Let us see what that does.

Here is section 2:

SEC. 2. That in making this declaration, and as a part of it, there are expressly reserved to the United States of America and its nationals any and all rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages, together with the right to enforce the same, to which it or they have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof; or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States of America by reason of its participation in the war or to which its nationals have thereby become rightfully entitled; or which, under the treaty of Versailles, have been stipulated for its or their benefits; or to which it is entitled as one of the principal allied and associated powers; or to which it is entitled by virtue of an act or acts of Congress; or otherwise.

Section 2 undertakes to reserve rights under the armistice. When peace is declared the armistice is terminated because an armistice is merely a truce to allow diplomatic negotiation. "Oh, but," they say, "we reserve rights under the treaty of Versailles." Let me demonstrate how ridiculous that pretense is. The proposition that the United States may reserve rights under a treaty which she has failed to ratify and has repudiated constitutes such a mockery of accepted legal principles that its assertion by men in high and responsible station is amazing. A party is not bound by a contract to which it is not a party. A treaty is a compact or contract between two or more nations. The United States has refused to ratify the treaty of Versailles. It has declined to be bound by it, and having so declined, is not bound. If the United States is not bound, neither is Germany bound to the United States.

But if you can reserve rights under the treaty of Versailles, then Germany is bound in some way to us by the treaty of Versailles. If Germany is required to respect any right or any assertion which we may make, then she must be bound. The United States is not bound, because we have repudiated and heaped with abuse the treaty of Versailles. If the United States is not bound, then Germany has no right under the treaty which she can require us to respect. Can it be that Germany, who has ratified the treaty, can have no rights whatever under it as against us, when we, who have not ratified it, can have rights under it which she is bound to respect? The existence of a right implies the power to demand it and to enforce its acknowledgment.

If you can reserve something which you have not, then you will perform a legislative miracle in this day and time. The dictionary says that to reserve is to hold on to that which is your own; to hold it back for a little time. You can not hold back something which you have not. We now have no rights under the treaty, because we have never had any rights under it.

But suppose that we could legally reserve those rights, then the reservation appearing in section 2 becomes a treaty. Whenever Congress by legislative act adopts any language or any clause or any sentence in a compact, in a treaty, or any other kind of obligation relating to a foreign power, and seeks to give vitality to it and to base rights upon it, then to the extent of that language the Congress is entering into a treaty with a foreign power. Now, let me show you why. If Congress can adopt any part of a treaty, then Congress can adopt all of the treaty. If Congress can adopt one line of a treaty which says that the United States has certain rights in certain property or that her citizens shall have certain rights, then Congress can adopt two lines, or three lines, or one hundred lines, or the whole treaty, and make it a part of the law of this land.

To the extent of such stipulation, it is an undertaking to make a contract or compact with a foreign Government, the terms of which are set forth in those clauses of the treaty defining the advantages and benefits sought to be claimed. Such an act is tantamount to erasing from the formal text of the treaty all language except that stipulating the rights and advantages which are sought to be reserved, and then ratifying by act of Congress that which remains. By such an act we say to Germany, "We will not agree with you to be bound by certain sections of the treaty. We do agree with you on those sections according us rights, and hold you to their performance." Any such agreement with a foreign power, though expressed in a single line, is a treaty. If made by Congress, it is a congressional treaty. It is unknown to the Constitution.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, stated on this floor some weeks ago that the Knox resolution infringes the treaty power. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], on June 11, 1921, in opening the debate in support of the resolution, said in this House:

Further, the Senate resolution fixes many terms and conditions of the treaty to be made with our late enemies, thereby unmistakably invading the Executive's prerogative which vests him with the exclusive initiative in the making of treaties.

Their statements were based upon the fact that the Knox resolution attempts a reservation of rights until a treaty makes "suitable provision for the satisfaction of all claims," and so forth.

My response to that, gentlemen of the House, is that if Congress can reserve rights in the treaty of Versailles for 1 day it can reserve those rights for 2 days, or 1 year, or 2 years, or 10 years, or for any other period which it may see fit, even until the negotiation of some specific description of a treaty, unless in the meantime those rights are changed or abrogated by another treaty.

This is but another evidence of the absurdity of the attempt to reserve rights. The clause in the Knox resolution to reserve them until a particular kind of treaty is made is ineffective, because when any kind of treaty modifying or settling those rights is hereafter made and ratified it has the effect to that extent of repealing the resolution. They are no longer reserved, because they no longer exist. The same is true of the Porter substitute now being considered. If the Knox resolution is not constitutional, neither is the Porter substitute.

So you can not stand upon the hypothesis or the theory that you are reserving something in a treaty; because whenever you do you are thereby making a treaty.

But let me suggest another phase. Suppose you could, under the Constitution, reserve rights in the treaty, would not the United States present an unworthy and an unenviable aspect before the bar of civilization? Would we not forfeit the fair renown which we have achieved before the world in claiming the benefits and the rights of a treaty whose obligations we spurn and cast out?

Would it not neutralize or destroy the splendid opinion which the world entertains that in entering the war and in fighting for our rights we were also fighting for the rights of civilization and for the establishment of liberty and justice and equity among the nations of the earth? For one I shall not be willing to put my country in such an attitude before the bar of history. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, President Harding was inaugurated on March 4 of the present year. Every moment since the time he lifted up his hand and took the oath of office his ample powers under the Constitution have authorized him to treat through the channels of diplomacy in any manner that he might see fit with the German Government and other Governments toward concluding a treaty of peace and toward settling the multifarious questions that the war has left on out doorstep. Why, gentlemen, he has had the unlimited power and authority, if he saw fit, to submit to the Senate of the United States the treaty of Versailles with or without reservations, with or without any league. That treaty is now in his office. That treaty has been in his office ever since he attained to the office of President. If he had desired, he could have submitted to the Senate for ratification the treaty of Versailles with such reservations as he had in mind when he addressed this Congress in this Chamber on the 12th of April, 1921. What did he say then?

The wiser course would seem to be the acceptance of the confirmation of our rights and interests as already provided and to engage under the existing treaty, assuming, of course, that this can be satisfactorily accomplished by such explicit reservations and modifications as will secure our absolute freedom from inadvisable commitments and safeguard all our essential interests.

[Applause.]

But, gentlemen, let me tell you that when the present President sat in the Senate of the United States he voted for the treaty of Versailles with the Lodge reservations. Surely he would not have voted for that treaty with those reservations if it did not reflect what he thought to be a proper settlement of the war with Germany.

He certainly would not have voted for the treaty of Versailles with the qualifying reservations which he did if that did not represent his conscientious conviction that it was the kind of a settlement that this country was entitled to; and if he did, that treaty is still in his office. Why does he not send it back to the Senate now, with the reservations which he approved, and ask the Senate either to approve it or to tie on still more reservations? He then would be saved the difficulty of a new negotiation.

But suppose he is not satisfied with that. Suppose he has changed his mind. Suppose he has changed his mind since he voted in the Senate and since he spoke here in this Chamber and said that the present treaty was the one upon which to base our rights. If he has changed his opinion, under the Constitution his powers are broad enough to permit him to throw the treaty of Versailles in the waste basket, and to proceed through his great Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, to negotiate an entirely new treaty settling all the questions of peace and war and trade and all the things that war has left on our hands. But he has declined to do it. His failure to act is not the failure of Congress. For that failure he is answerable, and not the Congress of the United States. For the plentitude of his powers the Constitution is responsible, but if there be poverty of performance he is responsible. [Applause.]

Ah, perhaps the zeal of the President has grown calm. Perhaps the zeal of the campaign was such as to cause him to make inconsiderate and thoughtless statements about what he would do with reference to the foreign policies of the United States. The tremendous responsibilities of the Presidency have sobered him and brought to him the realization that in his conduct of our foreign affairs he is the spokesman of the Nation and not simply of a party and he has grown cautious. The solemn and stunning knowledge has come to him that difficulties lie in his pathway. He has found that his pathway is stony. Even though it is not as stony as that of his predecessor, he finds it difficult now to do the things for which he blamed the man who occupied that high station before him. [Applause.] The President is a man of gracious and pleasing personality, and inspired by patriotic impulses, and I shall not indulge in criticism of him except as my duty in considering this resolution as it affects his functions requires.

The President in his address to the Senate and the House stated on April 12, 1921:

To establish the state of technical peace without further delay I should approve a declaratory resolution by Congress to that effect, with the qualifications essential to protect all our rights. * * *

Such a resolution should undertake to do no more than thus to declare the state of peace which all America craves.

The President's haste was then hot. He must have this resolution without further delay, and yet three months have transpired from the beginning of his term and two months of the session of Congress, and now we have it presented for the first time. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania why the delay. What has occurred at home or abroad to delay the plan for peace? He may answer now if he desires. Why, he may say, because he wanted to wait until Germany made the first reparation payment. Now, gentlemen, if you have to wait until she makes the first reparation payment, why, by the same logic, not wait until she makes the second reparation payment? [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, by the same logic, until she makes the third. Sirs, if something transpired across the water, if something transpired in world affairs a month ago which caused you to hesitate and hold back, how do you know but something may transpire a month from now which will make you regret that you ever passed the resolution?

Senator Harding, on July 22, 1920, in his speech accepting the Republican nomination, said:

I promise you formal and effective peace so quickly as a Republican Congress can pass its declaration for a Republican Executive to sign.

A special dispatch to the Washington Star from San Augustine, Fla., where the President elect was at that time, under date of February 8, 1921, said in part:

When Warren Harding, as President of the United States, sends his first message to the extra session of Congress he will ask for the immediate passage of the Knox resolution declaring the war against Germany and Austria at an end. * * * Mr. Harding will announce that immediately the resolution of peace is passed by Congress and approved by himself he will undertake the negotiation of a commercial treaty with what was once the German Empire.

Then a little later the Washington press carried the following notice:

PRESIDENT HARDING NOT INSISTING UPON HASTY PEACE ACTION.

President Harding is not asking for delay in the adoption by the House of a peace resolution, it was said to-day in high administration quarters, but because of the situation in Europe growing out of the reparations settlement he is not insisting that there should be any haste in putting the measure through.

Again, on May 20, the Washington Herald carried this notice:

HARDING URGES ACTION TO END STATE OF WAR—PEACE RESOLUTION AWAITS FIRST REPARATION PAYMENT BY GERMANY—CHANGES GUARD AMERICAN RIGHTS—AVOID EMBARRASSING ALLIES BY ACTING TOO QUICKLY IS NOW PLAN.

Establishment of peace with Germany by a declaration of Congress, it is learned, will await Germany's first reparations payment to the Allies. The payment is scheduled for June 1.

The unsettled European situation, which has delayed the declaratory peace in Congress for two months, is considered sufficiently clarified for the House Foreign Affairs Committee to resume work on the resolution. But its passage will not be immediate.

On May 20 he is getting cautious; he is finding a hard, rocky, briary, and perilous road.

Gentlemen, foreign affairs should never be lowered to the plane of partisan politics. All Americans should face in one direction—toward the enemy, or even a friendly power, when American interests are at stake.

This resolution a year ago was begotten of spite toward President Wilson and a desire to embarrass him before the country. Even now it is being made the vehicle of unsatisfied partisan scorn.

On May 28, 1921, there appeared in the Washington Post the following:

FRAMES PEACE RESOLUTION—HOUSE COMMITTEE REPUBLICANS AGREE ON FORM OF MEASURE.

Republican members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee agreed yesterday on the form of a peace resolution, which will be put before the full committee next Thursday for adoption.

We there have notice that the Republican majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has prepared a resolution known as the Porter resolution and will later submit it to the committee with a demand that it be reported as written. The newspaper reporter was given more information than was vouchsafed to the Democratic members of the committee. True to form, that course was followed, and now under a special rule, which prevents amendment, it is to be driven through the House as a partisan measure.

I warn the leaders on the Republican side not to be too reckless and rash. Considerations that turned your impatience hurriedly into caution and fear should warn you in the most solemn manner that you are treading upon dangerous, yea perilous, ground when Congress undertakes to invade the province of treaty or peace making, and obtrudes itself into foreign affairs whose conduct under the Constitution is vested in the President.

There are other complicated matters still unsettled. President Harding has appointed observers on the Reparations Commission, the Supreme Council, and the Council of Ambassadors. If peace without a treaty is declared, must not they be recalled?

Congress has not been advised of the state of foreign and diplomatic affairs. Excepting the President, the Secretary of State alone acquires full and complete information. Was Secretary of State Hughes called before the Committee on Foreign Affairs to express his views? I direct the question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Why was he not called? Will Congress act without consulting, without hearing the distinguished Secretary of State? Will a partisan majority plunge wildly and recklessly into the dark labyrinth of foreign affairs without the sanction or wise counsel of Judge Hughes? Will anyone contend that Secretary Hughes favors this plan? If he does, where and when has he said so? If the Secretary favored this measure, the report would have informed the House of his approval.

I make the statement that the resolution is unwise and unnecessary, and for the fact that it is unnecessary I call Senator Warren G. Harding as a witness. A year ago, on May 15, when he voted for the Knox resolution, he rose in his place in the Senate and said:

I do not regard a pronouncement of formal peace as tremendously essential to the welfare of the United States or to the promotion of our trade relationship with the other nations of the world. I do not think a formal declaration of peace is essential to continued freedom from hostilities; I do not think it possible that Germany is likely to resume armed warfare against this Republic in two generations to come; nor does it seem to me necessary to have this formal declaration, particularly in this form, in order to resume our commercial relations with Germany, for they are already more or less resumed, and, in the very nature of things, trade relations with Germany will be developed according to the needs of that people and our own inclination to trade.

There has been but one way of recovery from war and war waste since the world began, and that is to work, to produce, and exchange; but we need not worry on this side of the Atlantic, for the war-torn nations of the Old World are just as certain to seek our favors in trade as that to-morrow shall come. So the peace resolution is not seriously involved in a continuation of peaceful relationships.

If it was not necessary a year ago, is it necessary now except to redeem a rash and unwise campaign pledge that we would make peace as soon as a Republican Congress could write it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In that address he added:

I think the significance of the passage of this resolution lies in its reestablishment of the constitutional powers of the American Congress.

He was then anxious to maintain the constitutional powers of the Congress, of which he was a Member. Has his viewpoint undergone a change?

The President in his address to Congress on April 12, 1921, in referring to a peace resolution, said:

In correcting the failure of the Executive, in negotiating the most important treaty in the history of the Nation, to recognize the constitutional powers of the Senate we would go to the other extreme, equally objectionable, if Congress or the Senate should assume the function of the Executive. Our highest duty is the preservation of the constituted powers of each and the promotion of the spirit of cooperation so essential to our common welfare.

Constitutional processes can not be preserved by a congressional treaty.

The Executive proclaims his jealousy of the presidential prerogative and warns Congress not to invade it. Let me suggest that the surest way for the President to prevent Congress from invading his province is for the President himself to exercise his powers and prerogatives.

If the President is fearful that Congress may, in making peace, invade the domain of his authority, he may find complete safety by himself making a treaty of peace. That very contingency illustrates the error in the theory that Congress can make peace. The power, under the Constitution, can not rest in two places—it can not reside in Congress and also reside in the President and Senate alone.

If that were true, the President might negotiate a treaty and submit it to the Senate; failing to receive the necessary two-thirds of the Senate, he could submit it in the form of a joint resolution and by a majority of 1 in each House make a treaty in defiance of the constitutional requirement that two-thirds of the Senate must concur.

On April 8, 1920, Mr. ROGERS, of Massachusetts, ranking Republican on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in a speech in this House said:

Before proceeding, however, it may be well to reiterate that a treaty of peace is unquestionably the normal and the desirable method of concluding war. I still hope that a formal treaty may in the future be ratified. It is only when for some reason a treaty of peace proves impracticable that recourse is had to other methods. * * *

In conclusion, I repeat my regret and chagrin that peace has not been attained through the normal and far preferable medium of a treaty.

On that same occasion the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], the author of this resolution, said:

It is true that the usual and normal method of terminating a war status is by a treaty made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate.

Each foreign war of the United States was terminated by normal method of treaty. The Revolutionary War by the treaty of Paris, September 3, 1783; the War of 1812 by the treaty of Ghent, December 24, 1814; the Mexican War by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, February 2, 1848; the War with Spain by the treaty of Paris, December 10, 1898. If a return to normalcy is desirable, the President is free to embrace an excellent opportunity to make peace in the normal manner.

This Government is now conducting diplomatic negotiations with other Governments regarding the island of Yap, Shantung, oil interests in Dutch East India, and American interests in Mexico; why can not it negotiate a treaty about peace—is it of less importance than these?

Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to witness the establishment of peace, a genuine and constitutional peace, a real peace that will definitely settle the issues at stake and not leave them suspended and undetermined.

Gentlemen of the House, you are about to do a foolish and unworthy thing. I want to warn you that what you are about to do in making peace by this resolution will not fulfill the duties which we owe to the people of our country. In April, 1917, when Congress in the name of the people of the United States declared the existence of a state of war, there were in the mind of the Nation clear and definite purposes. The heart of America was stirred by a fervid resolve to right the wrongs that had forced us to draw the sword. There was the purpose to revenge the loss of American life on the highways of the sea; there was the purpose of demanding reparation for American property and American lives. There was the purpose to fight for high ideals, for the establishment of justice, and liberty, and equity among the nations of the earth; there was the purpose to fight in such a way as to render the enemy so impotent that he never again could challenge the safety of the world. There was the purpose to serve notice that no other nation could ever do so with safety. There was the purpose to make a peace which would last and to have a part in that peace. Have those ends been accomplished? Where is the man who has been paid for his ship sunk at sea? Where is the widow or mother who has had indemnification for the death of loved ones whose bones even now are washed and rolled by the tireless tides of a restless sea? Have we so soon forgotten the wailing cries of little children as with outstretched hands they were swept beneath the swirling waters of the deep?

Where is the guaranty to the United States that Germany will disarm and stay disarmed? Where is the pledge to the United States that war, like a bell in the night, shall not again hideously rouse us from the sleep of peace? Did America go to war simply to prove her prowess at arms? The history of the past supplied in glorious fashion that proof. Did she go to war like the gladiator to test the strength of her arm or the temper of her blade? Was the war simply an international contest to decide the championship of the world?

No, Mr. Speaker, no such base or sordid motive dwelt within America's heart. With lofty purpose and chastened spirit, with uplifted face, and beckoned on by no low or mean temptation, the people of the United States and their Government, when patience could no longer tolerate repeated outrage and wrong, mustered their gallant hosts and sent them charging across the fields of Europe to glorious triumph—a triumph of terrific cost in blood and life and misery and sorrow. America fought an honorable war. She must not make a dishonorable peace. I shall never be willing to approach the little mounds above our heroic dead and place on them this scrap of paper covered with surrender and repudiation of the cause for which they fought. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a request for unanimous consent, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield?

Mr. PORTER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization I am authorized to report House joint resolution 153, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have until 9 o'clock to-night to file such report, and that the minority may have until the same time to do the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, under what rule does the gentleman have the right to report the resolution from the floor of the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am asking unanimous consent to have until 9 o'clock to-night to file a report, and that the minority may have until that time to file their views. I am reporting the resolution through the basket.

Mr. RAKER. I do not think we ought to do that. Let it go into the basket and let it take its usual course.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Very well. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request and will file the report through the basket now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects.

TERMINATION OF THE WAR.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, there are two principal reasons for the passage of this resolution, one of which appears in the first section, the other in the second. First, to terminate a technical state of war which exists, although hostilities have ceased and our allies have concluded definitive agreements with Germany, and, second, in order that there may be an unequivocal assertion of our rights, arising from our participation in the war, including legislation enacted by Congress, seizures in pursuance of that legislation, and also our rights under and by virtue of the treaty of Versailles. Taking these up in their order an incongruous situation exists. Hostilities have ceased, the war is at an end, Germany as a military power is prostrate, but the declaration that war exists is still on the statute books. What are some of the disadvantages that exist by reason of that?

The free play of commerce is hampered. That credit which Germany might obtain in this country for the purchase of our abounding surplus of agricultural products and raw material is forbidden to her, because, strictly speaking, war between States renders illegal any transaction between the nationals of either party. We have not resumed diplomatic relations. Only a so-called commissioner acts for us. That attention which consuls and diplomatic officials could give to the wide range of American interests is lacking. Spain is the country selected for taking care of our rights. The citizens of neither country can bring suit in the courts of the other, except for certain specific purposes very limited in their extent, authorized by the trading with the enemy act. Still further, we are out of line with conditions under which we should do everything that makes for amicable relations.

What are some of the objections to this resolution? It is said in the first place that it is unconstitutional, that the sole right to make peace rests with the President under a treaty to be ratified by the Senate. Mr. Speaker, we have broken the fetters of strict construction which restrained us for so many years. We have come to realize that in this great expanding country the Constitution must be a flexible document. It may be true, as has been said here, that in the constitutional convention a proposition was made that Congress should have the right to make peace, and this was voted down, but that rejection is not conclusive. In that same constitutional convention a proposition was brought forward by Mr. Madison that a national bank might be established. That was voted down, yet in the first administration after the adoption of the Constitution a national bank was established. One of the strongest contentions of the strict constructionists in earlier years was that there was no right of annexation of foreign territory by treaty or, in fact, in any other way. Mr. Jefferson said there was "necessity for shutting up the Constitution, or amending it"; but, as an amendment was not possible, he yielded to the idea that the object to be secured by the annexation of Louisiana justified the means, and so a treaty was entered into, under which that vast accession was made to our territory. In all cases but two—Texas and Hawaii—annexation has been by treaty.

I note that two gentlemen from Texas have stressed the idea that peace by resolution is invalid. Gentlemen of Texas, I want to ask you how did your splended State come into this great array of Commonwealths, making up this Union? [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire an answer to that?

Mr. BURTON. I must decline to yield. How are we freed from the deprivation which would occur if we were without the eloquence and the patriotism of the Members who come from that State? President Tyler submitted a treaty to the Senate in 1844, as Mr. Wilson did in 1919. The former was negotiated with the independent Republic of Texas, providing for annexation. The Senate failed to ratify it, and on the following 1st of March, 1845, a resolution was passed providing under conditions that Texas might be annexed, and under that resolution and not by treaty Texas came into this Union. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to concede that this Congress, nearest to the hearts of the people, has not the right to declare that peace exists. Suppose we had a President stern and severe, like some of the despots that have ruled in Latin America, who desired to continue a war, although the people were against it. Would the only right of Congress be to refuse supplies? Can Congress not, having the right to declare war, also exercise the right to declare peace as well? I am unwilling to concede that the right does not exist in all cases. But this situation is very exceptional. Here peace actually does exist. A treaty has been made by our allies under which Germany has laid down her arms, a treaty which, so far as regards actual cessation of the contest, applies to all nations. Our entrance into the great struggle was not under an ordinary declaration of hostilities, but under a statement that war had been thrust upon us by the action of the Imperial Government of Germany. That Government has been overthrown. Are we so bound by constitutional limitations that Congress, which declared as a statement of fact that war existed, can not now declare as a statement of fact that war does not exist? Mr. Speaker, let us throw the constitutional argument into the wastebasket.

But it is said that we are untrue to our allies. How are we untrue to our allies? A treaty has been framed and is in operation. Not for more than a century has there been a treaty more severe in its provisions. Under it Germany's resources to the last farthing, all her most vital political and economic interests, are subject to the dictation of the conquerors. Our allies have made haste to take advantage of this treaty in the promotion of trade and in every possible way. Diplomatic relations have been restored by all of them. British troops passing through Germany on the way to Silesia were everywhere greeted with enthusiastic acclaim. A conference has been in progress at Weisbaden having in view the establishment of closer trade relations between France and Germany.

Yet when we were asked merely to submit a proposition from Germany to the Allies we declined.

Have we not done enough for Belgium, of which mention has been made, to merit her lasting gratitude? Have not our millions of soldiers gone across the sea, our men and women, for the succor of all these peoples? Have we not done with our might what we could toward bringing about a lasting peace which shall be of benefit to the world? What do gentlemen want? Do they think that we should send our warships to Hamburg and to Bremen to bombard German ports? Do they wish our Army should march into Germany, that our transports should carry across other troops? That is what you really mean. What significance is there in a continuance of a state of war unless armies and navies are to engage in combat? Face the facts when you say that this resolution ought not to be passed. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now is the time when peace should prevail, and we wish to cure conditions as far as possible in a troubled world. And so we make declaration for peace, declaration that the last trace of this terribly bloody war must be at an end. It is said that we will have relinquished certain rights. If we relinquish rights by this resolution we will still be relinquishing rights if the war lasts for a thousand years.

No advantages can be lost. In this connection I may say that the second section here is just as necessary as is the first, because we reserve our rights and it is necessary we should do so. If we did not reserve those rights by express declaration of the will of the people Germany might urge that the treaties of 1785, 1799, and 1828, providing for the mutual protection of the property of the citizens of each country in case of war, were still binding. Germany might also maintain that the general rules of international law under which the property of nationals in an enemy country may be safe——

Mr. COCKRAN. How would that claim by Germany affect us?

Mr. BURTON. Because we by solemn declaration would wipe out the condition of war, but omit to claim for ourselves the results by reason of our participation in that war.

Mr. COCKRAN. How could we wipe out by declaration here the obligations of a treaty?

Mr. BURTON. Obligations of a treaty—I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. COCKRAN. I will wait, I would like to hear it.

Mr. BURTON. There was no justification for our course in seizing and disposing of enemy property except the very extraordinary nature of the late contest. This country has taken the lead in regard for immunity of title of nationals in an enemy country. It has occupied that position, but Germany in the fierceness and brutality of her conduct in waging war, by glaring violation of treaties and established rules of international law, became an outlaw, and thus we were justified in regarding these old treaties as void and in making seizures and imposing penalties, altogether out of line with our traditional policy. As Secretary Lansing declared at the outset, it would be utterly futile to enter into further negotiations when this country was considering the question as to whether these treaties had any binding force.

Mr. COCKRAN rose.

Mr. BURTON. I really could not yield further. I have such a short time. It is thus due to the exceptional nature of this contest and to our exceptional action in pursuance thereof that it is desirable to pass the second part of the resolution.

A treaty is a necessary sequence to this resolution. Manifestly the best course would be to become a party to the treaty of Versailles, no matter how many reservations may be necessary to safeguard our interests. On this subject President Harding said:

The wiser course would seem to be the acceptance of the confirmation of our rights and interests as already provided and to engage under the existing treaty, assuming, of course, that this can be satisfactorily accomplished by such explicit reservations and modifications as will secure our absolute freedom from inadvisable commitments and safeguard all our essential interests.

Germany has not the right of free and independent action in the control of her foreign, or even of her domestic, affairs. She is under such supervision and control that whatever agreement is made with her must have the sanction, or rather the cooperation, of the allied powers, to which she is in great degree subject. Also, there would have to be a treaty with Germany herself. But it is not strictly a treaty of peace that we would negotiate with that country. It would be a treaty of commerce and amity, settling these various questions which must arise between countries after cessation of war, when existing engagements have been annulled. Let us never lose sight of that. Another reason for the passage of this resolution is the very considerable delay which naturally will ensue before treaties can be agreed upon.

Now, I will discuss briefly our right to accept the advantages conferred upon us by the provisions of the treaty of Versailles. What was the general aim of that treaty? It was most ambitious. It aimed at a settlement of the affairs of the whole world and sought to fix relations between countries. That is manifest not only in the general tenor of the treaty but by its respective stipulations; Germany abandons rights possessed and incurs obligations to various countries irrespective of participation in the treaty or of their action in ratifying it.

Covenants are entered into for the benefit of the principal allied and associated powers and the allied and associated powers. The United States is included in both of these groups, and whenever it is the intention to restrict the rights acquired to the contracting parties which ratify the treaty it is made manifest in the body of the instrument. All through there are provisions pertaining to nations which either were not parties in the negotiations or which were parties, but did not ratify. First, in the armistice of November 11, 1918, appears a demand for the release of all neutral vessels; a provision that the Black Sea ports should be evacuated; that restrictions on neutral vessels engaged in trade should be canceled. When we examine the treaty itself there is a section with reference to Luxemburg under which Germany renounces the benefit of treaties in her favor entered into with that country. Luxemburg was not a party to the treaty. There is an agreement with reference to Denmark, requiring a plebiscite to determine whether Schleswig should remain a part of Germany or be restored to Denmark. The vote was taken, and a majority favored annexation to Denmark, and that annexation was carried out. There was a provision with regard to Russia—a country which by no means had any participation in this conference—to the effect that the treaty of Brest-Litovsk should be abrogated and that Germany should thereafter respect the independence of all the territories which were part of the former Russian Empire. The right was also reserved to Russia to obtain from Germany restitution and reparation based on the principles of the treaty. China was released from payment to Germany of the balance of the Boxer indemnity of 1901 and the German concessions in the cities of Hankow and Tientsin were surrendered. It was also agreed that certain astronomical instruments belonging to China, taken away from Pekin in 1901, should be returned. China did not ratify this treaty. Every one of these agreements is in full force and effect.

Now, let me read one or two provisions. It is claimed we will not have any opportunity to obtain indemnity for the cost since the armistice of the maintenance of our troops in the Rhine region. Page 111, article——

Mr. KUNZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. I will.

Mr. KUNZ. If the resolution is passed, will the United States be bound by the treaties of 1799 and 1828?

Mr. BURTON. I think not. War and the acts of Congress have destroyed their binding force. The general principle is that an act of Congress supersedes a treaty. Of course, the other party might by force maintain that the treaty existed, but Germany is not in a position to do that. At the same time, in view of the fact that these treaties were framed for the express purpose of determining the rights of private citizens in case of war, we should not leave the door open. That fact makes this second section necessary, giving us the benefit of all seizures under the acts of Congress.

In the section on page 111 to which I referred, provision is made for the cost of our armies of occupation, after the armistice and after the treaty, and these charges have priority. They are preferred claims under article 251, and article 252 safeguards our interests as follows:

The right of each of the allied and associated powers to dispose of enemy assets and property within its jurisdiction at the date of coming into force of the present treaty is not affected by the foregoing provisions.

That is, we need not turn over property seized by us to any general fund for reparations. Reparations in general are secured to us by article 297, of which paragraph (b) is as follows:

Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present treaty, the allied and associated powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property rights and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them within their territories.

And so forth.

Paragraph (d) of the same article validates exceptional war measures and refers to paragraphs 1 and 3 in an annex to article 297. These assure the validity of vesting orders for winding up businesses or companies of German nationals. Paragraph 4 of the annex was especially framed with a view to securing payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government between July 31, 1914, and the date when the United States entered the war. This is familiarly known as the Lusitania paragraph.

In paragraph (1) of article 297 the obligation is imposed upon Germany to compensate her citizens for property seized in the following language:

Germany undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect to the sale or retention of property rights or interests in allied or associated States.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes more.

Mr. BURTON. I regret I am not able to dwell upon this part of the subject more thoroughly. The total value of enemy property seized by us is estimated at $350,000,000. This may not be sufficient to meet just claims for reparation, but we could occupy no better situation in this regard if a technical state of war continues. Have we any advantage in declaring to Germany, "We will not cease war or make a treaty with you until you are nearer to annihilation"? Are we of that type? Have we no spirit of mercy? We all recognize the savage campaign waged by Germany; but Germany is a part of this world, and will live in it and will live with us. That country has made a great contribution to civilization and literature, to music, art, and science, and has been at the forefront in many branches of endeavor. They fell under the spell of the Hohenzollern dynasty, and the spirit of jingoism with a desire for world domination permeated every part of her population. I do not sympathize with the idea that it was merely the Junker class that led to the war. The whole German people were obsessed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BURTON. Two or three minutes is all I desire.

Germany should make expiation to the last pfennig which she is able to pay for the suffering and ruin which she has wrought. But we ought not to seek to make them permanent serfs. Maybe the drastic restrictions upon the maintenance of an army and navy imposed by the Allies will turn the attention of the people to fields of helpful endeavor and thus in the industrial race Germany may make more rapid progress than her conquerors.

First of all, it would seem that there is no proper feeling in Germany that they have been guilty of wrongdoing in the course they have been pursuing. Nor is there a complete realization in the minds of the people that they have been defeated. But, with time and a calmer consideration of eternal principles of right and wrong, let us trust that Germany will cherish the traditions of earlier years and those ideals which they have "loved long since and lost awhile." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in the few minutes allotted to me I want to give some attention to the objections on the minority side of the House to the passage of this resolution.

That the House has two or three times before passed a similar resolution and then sees fit to pass this one to-day does not lie with any force. That this resolution may be different from the one that may be passed by the Senate seems to me to have no weight in coming to a conclusion as to what action should be had at this time.

And, again, the constitutionality of this instrument has been attacked by men on the Democratic side. What does the resolution do? And in calling this to your attention I do so in order to make clear that section 1 of the resolution does nothing more than recite the finding of a fact. Now, I appeal to the men on this, the Democratic, side—the men on the other side of the House, I am sure, already see it—is it possible for the United States Congress by joint resolution to pass a resolution of finding of fact that will be unconstitutional?

Now, I will grant if we go into the treaty-making power it is entirely questionable whether or not it could be unconstitutional or whether it would stand the test of the courts. But let us see about that. I submit to the minority membership that when, under any emergency, this body, in conjunction with the other body, delegates unusual powers to the Chief Executive of the country to change existing relations and status between two nations, it is beyond the power of Congress to interfere in that relationship.

Hence we are not treading on the treaty-making power and can not tread upon the treaty-making power if we were so to desire. The relationship which was brought about with Germany, economical and social and international, was a relationship that was produced by Germany being on the aggressive side, and the only way that that relationship can be changed from the status it now finds itself to be in is by a treaty with the United States, made by the Chief Executive and ratified by the Senate; and we are not attempting to do anything to interfere with that power.

The charge has been made that if we enact this peace resolution we will be forfeiting some of the rights, some of the privileges, some of the advantages that have accrued to the United States or to its nationals during the state of war. I want to ask any man on the minority side how you can forfeit anything in an agreement in which you are not going to participate—even if by the recitation of the reservation we fail to reserve it, how we can forfeit it in a unilateral contract?

A treaty, if it is anything in the world, is a contract between nations, and if we have no power to enter into the negotiation of that treaty, how by the passage of a resolution could we forfeit any of our rights to be attained under that instrument?

I submit to you that the only thing left to you is, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has recited—the only thing left to do between the United States and Germany is to settle the dispute on an economic basis and to establish a new ground of international relationship between the two countries. That is the only possible thing that can be done.

Suppose two men have a dispute. The dispute may linger along in the courts for a number of years. If two nations have a dispute the final adjustment and settlement of that dispute may last a number of years; but in order to adjust and settle that dispute it is not necessary that one of those parties keep on in a condition of a technical state of war.

It seems to me preposterous to take the position that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] takes, that the United States can get better terms under the final treaty that is made if we do not pass this resolution, but sit down at the table with Germany as enemies. Do you mean to say, you men who expect to vote against this resolution—do you mean to indicate to me and to this House that you expect the United States to extract from an enemy something that she would not grant in any other capacity? The history of the United States is replete with evidence after evidence of generosity on the part of this Government toward an enemy, or an enemy country, and every utterance of the Chief Executive prior to March 4 this year was to the effect that we went into this war on the high plane of the defense of civilization, and that we asked and demanded nothing in the way of dollar payment, and that we were only fighting for a principle, and not for any self-aggrandizement. If that be the policy of this country—and I am one who believes that to be the policy of this Nation—if that be so, even though we are exchanging our technical status from that of an enemy country to that of a peaceful country, we have nothing to fear and nothing to lose when we sit down at the peace table and undertake to negotiate the settlement of the past claims and differences between the two nations and adjust a working agreement for the future, because that is what a treaty amounts to. We can do it as peaceful nations as well as enemy nations.

I want to say a word regarding the minority report. The minority report says that the Congress has no right to enter into a contract between nations. I think I have made that clear. I think my colleague from Ohio who preceded me [Mr. BURTON] made it clearer than I, that we are not undertaking to enter into any contract with nations; we are simply reciting a condition of facts which exist and which no one can deny.

You gentlemen on this side, are you willing to vote that you do not believe that the termination of a state of war is needed between the two countries—a mere repeal of a declaration of war, a mere declaration of a finding of fact as to the completion of the war, the finding of the previous fact that we found, that any peril no longer exists?

They say not one single American citizen will be benefited by this resolution. I contend that every last American citizen will be profited by such a result, too long deferred. Millions of dollars of damage will have accrued to millions of Americans. I want to ask the Democratic side—I want to ask the minority members of the committee—how did any of our nationals gain any material advantage under the war? The only way that we could gain any material advantage under the war was to take advantage of the war condition and buy some alien property that was offered for sale by the Alien Property Custodian. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Committee on Foreign Affairs that it has made an improvement in this resolution over that of April last a year ago. The Members who were in the House at that time will recall a very extraordinary omission in that resolution, an omission not found under the resolution now under consideration, namely, a similar declaration of so-called peace with Austria-Hungary. Why the omission and why the distinction between Germany on the one hand and Austria-Hungary on the other no one can understand or explain.

I wish also to congratulate the committee that has adopted its own resolution instead of that of the Senate, although I must admit that if we looked at the matter purely from the logical viewpoint, coupled with the power of the Congress, the position of the Senate is more logical than that of the House. As I understand the jurisdiction of the House, it has no power to do anything except to concur in the repeal of a resolution which Congress has heretofore enacted, and I seriously doubt that Congress has even this jurisdiction when it is invoked to declare peace.

We have never declared war against Germany; we have simply recognized an existing state of war with Germany. Therefore the logical position is to recognize the end of the war by the repeal of this declaration of recognition of war. But the motives that have moved this particular declaration are to be applauded, for the report of the committee asserts that it is unwilling to approve any expression that makes an apology, express or implied, for the war against the Imperial German Government and Austria-Hungary.

I wish to call to the attention of the House that the first reason advanced in the report of over a year ago for this declaration on the part of the Congress was that there was a deadlock between the Senate and the executive department, the treaty-making agency of the Government. That was the first reason and the most stressed reason in the report, and I am sure that it contained the strongest appeal to the majority of the House. Then the majority advanced the idea that it was exercising this extraordinary power because of the deadlock between the Executive and the Senate. To-day you must bottom your reason for your action upon the ground that the Government now is no longer deadlocked, but that it has broken down. The ordinary constitutional agencies to bring about peace have not been called into operation. There is no justification or excuse for this failure, for the Senate and the Executive, which is the treaty-making power, is under the entire control of the majority, and yet after three months these agencies have not functioned, and have failed to try to bring about peace, which you affirm is the most desirable thing on earth.

But what does the majority gain by this resolution? You do that which you have no authority to do if you do anything, or you do nothing. This resolution is wholly a unilateral pronouncement. Every intelligent citizen knows that the statutes of the United States have no extraterritorial effect. Congress may pass resolutions of peace from now until the crack of doom, and until they are assented to by the Government affected they are but "paper and packthread."

Therefore, if your resolution has any merit it must be assented to by Germany and Austria-Hungary, and if assented to by them it practically becomes a treaty, and if a treaty this House has no constitutional jurisdiction to touch it, for it is a plain invasion of two other constitutional agencies of our Gvernment, and this plain invasion can not be cured or remedied by the consent of the agencies so invaded.

But, gentlemen, I now call your attention in the short time allotted to me to what I think is a grave matter. When by this resolution you declare peace—and I must dissent from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who thinks the resolution is perfection in phraseology—I think you have not properly done what you improperly wish to do; to set forth that a state of peace exists. Congress can not declare peace, it can not establish peace. Peace, for the purposes of this discussion, exists by reason of the train of circumstances, by the procession of facts, and all the Congress can do is to recognize this fact, not to establish this fact. You may say that this is a play upon words; but, gentlemen, sometimes words are things. If the Congress recognizes peace as a fact, and upon that fact makes its declaration, there may be some logic in its position; but when Congress undertakes to establish and declare peace, it is acting beyond the scope of its agency and beyond its authority and power.

But you declare peace, you contend, because you wish to prepare for and facilitate a treaty of peace. You wish to stimulate and facilitate the exercise of the treaty-making function, the real peace-making function, of the Government, is the contention. But does this resolution accomplish this purpose? What is one serious effect of the resolution conceding that it will be operative? War suspends the laws and the rights existing between the belligerents. This is the settled American law and practice save as it may be vaguely modified by the doctrine of uti possidetis, a variant and precarious reliance for America. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that war only suspends the rights of the belligerents, and when war is over and peace is declared those rights that have been suspended, namely, the rights and duties in existence at the date of the declaration of war, and not at the date of the declaration of peace, are revived. Thus by the very force of the resolution, if it has any effect at all, you give Germany the rights she had on the day of our declaration of recognition of a state of war and deny us possibly the rights we had at the close of the war. Then Germany will base her rights at the peace table upon her treaty of 1828 and will there and then assert those rights. And what position will we be in to deny them?

When we sit at the table with Germany we should do so in no spirit of vengeance, but a nation that has so shocked and crippled the civilization of this world is not likely to make satisfactory agreements at the peace table unless we go there somewhat panoplied as victors. [Applause.] I am unwilling to hobble the American Government in such a great transaction. I am unwilling that the other nations may negotiate with their hats on their heads while America must go with her hat in her hand, a suppliant negotiating upon equal terms with a nation that has ravaged the civilization of this world. [Applause.]

I would vote here to-day as independently as I voted for war. There should be no partisanship in this great matter. The lack of partisanship that declared war should obtain in the making of peace. Why not go back to the normal way of doing business of this grave and solemn character? Why, for the first time in the history of the Nation, shall we adopt this anomalous and unknown course?

It has been asserted in debate that we admitted Texas by a similar resolution. It is a long time since I have read the history of that event, and the distinguished and honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] may be correct, but my recollection is that this Government passed a resolution giving the conditions of admission and that the Texan government passed an identical resolution, coupled with an acceptance, which was an admission of a State in pursuance of the Constitution, and therefore Texas came into the Union not in conformity to international law but by virtue of the constitutional requirements or conditions appertaining to the admission of new States. There was no other way by which the admission could have been accomplished.

Mr. Speaker, what effect can this resolution have? Unless Germany passes an identical corresponding statute it can have no effect whatever. But the consideration of this resolution has had one good result—it has consumed time. I am pleased that the chairman of this committee [Mr. PORTER], in conference perhaps with administration authorities, has waited thus long for the consideration of this measure, because the longer we wait for the consummation of this sort of legislation the better faith have we kept with our great allies. [Applause.] I have no doubt of the accuracy of the statement made in this debate that if we had acted earlier we would have embarrassed the reparation settlement recently had by the German Government with the Allies. Of course earlier consideration would have embarrassed this negotiation and settlement all the more. If half that is said be true, Mr. Viviani's mission to this country was accomplished when he persuaded the American Government to wait until the Allies could meet at the reparation table and exact a settlement of Germany.

The delay has somewhat relieved us from embarrassment by resultingly aiding our allies, and I again suggest that a longer delay will still more help the Allies, unless we promptly deal with the whole matter by competent diplomacy.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. We have no allies now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; we have no allies now; that is very true and very sad. We had allies when at war, but we throw them overboard in peace, except that by this resolution we exact all the advantages accorded in the Versailles treaty, while ignominiously rejecting all responsibility therein imposed—an ignoble position for a great idealistic Nation to take. We reserve the loot but not the liability.

What should have been done—if I may be so audacious as to advance the thought—is that as soon as the President took his seat, he should have sent a commission of able men to the Allies, and then to the German Government, to see if something could not be preserved out of the wreck and the ruin, and something set up to prevent the terrible recurrence. For, gentlemen, deeper than your peace pronouncement, deeper than your treaty of Versailles, is the great question of whether or not the statesmanship of this world is willing to confess to the struggling masses of humanity that it is unable to do something to diminish the atrocities of war and the frequency of war. [Applause.] I make the assertion that unless the statesmanship of the hour does not do something reasonably quick the masses of the people will believe that that statesmanship is bankrupt in mind and in conscience, that it has not the mentality or spirituality to observe or control the great forces that are washing away the foundations of civilization. I fear that unless something is done we may look for a collapse of civilization and the recurrence of the Dark Ages. The alarm bells are ringing. This is no place or time for partisanship. Its assertion here has been ignoble and perhaps dangerous. There are too many complications. A congressional enactment is wholly wrong or inadequate. Invoke and employ all of the treaty powers of the Government, and exercise and apply them all in a spirit of the broadest justice, of the most catholic mercy, and of wise expediency for Germany and for America, justice to Germany and loyalty to our great Nation and its holiest ideals. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Senator MASON, who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that drafted this resolution, had expected to make a few remarks in support of the resolution to-day, but unfortunately he is detained at the hotel with a rather serious illness, and has asked me to read a few paragraphs of what he desired to say in support of that resolution:

"MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Chairman PORTER has arranged for me to extend my remarks on the peace resolution. I had hoped until to-day to be able to take a few minutes to explain a point which seems to have escaped most of us who have studied the best way to declare peace; and if you will give my friends and colleagues my statement on the main question I will be very thankful.

"With humility but with very great earnestness I give it as my opinion that this Congress can not repeal the declaration of the World War. To attempt to do so would be a legislative absurdity.

"The Constitution, following the Bill of Rights, gave Congress alone the power to declare a state of war, and so forth. Congress did declare the World War; all branches of the Government, including the people, responded. The winning and closing of the war is an historical fact, and any attempt to repeal it would be as futile as the passage of a resolution repealing the action of Congress whereby it, the Congress, submitted any one of the many amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

"A declaration of war is not a mere passing of a bill, subject to repeal at any time in the future, nor is that next highest duty and power granted to Congress, namely, the right to submit amendments to the Constitution subject to any congressional limitation after Congress has exhausted its power in submitting the question of amendment.

"A declaration of war is the greatest power given Congress. It is not the mere passing of an act affecting private rights or civil or criminal procedure; on the contrary, it is an act that changes the relations and conditions of every citizen and of every nation in the world. To repeal a law says by implication that the enforcement of the law worked injustice and unrightness. If we had the power, clearly our people are not ready to attempt to make an historical record that the act of war or any part of its conduct were not both just and righteous.

"Therefore, my dear colleague, the simple declaration of a state of peace or that the war is at an end is all that is necessary.

"The reservations have been most carefully drawn as a mere matter of precaution that we would not attempt to invade the treaty-making power, but reserved all possible rights that could come to our country by our participation in the war, and we have carefully guarded against ratifying or approving anything that has come to any American citizen by reason of the war unless that thing has come to him rightfully. This was done to prevent anyone from claiming any advantage which came to him from purchase from the Custodian of Alien Property.

"Thank you, my dear colleague, for reading this to all my friends who have been kind enough to listen. In the language of the immortal Grant, and in keeping with the spirit of the Master, 'Let us have peace.'

"Sincerely, yours,

"WILLIAM E. MASON.

"Hon. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS,
"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C."

[Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time has been used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has used 145 minutes and the gentleman from Virginia 160 minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES].

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it has been a privilege which I have highly esteemed to be associated upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs with the gentleman from North Carolina, who addressed the House with learning and eloquence on Saturday, for whom as a soldier, a distinguished lawyer, and an eminent statesman I have always held the highest respect; but when he asserts, speaking of the Constitution, that "not one line can be found in that great instrument which gives to Congress the right and power to declare peace," and proceeds to use the following language: "There is no power given to Congress to declare peace, and that power can not arise by implication; it is not a legislative power. This will clearly appear from the minutes of the convention which framed our Constitution." "The Supreme Court of the United States has sustained the position which I have just stated, that the termination of a foreign war and making peace does not belong to the legislative body," and cites the Anderson and Hijo cases in Ninth Wallace and One hundred and ninety-fourth United States as his authority, I feel called upon to challenge his statement, and to discuss the question he raises.

By section 8 of Article I, the Congress is given power "to declare war," in connection with the power to "raise and support armies," and to "provide and maintain a navy," as well as "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Coupled with these powers in the same section is the authority "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

This clause has been considered and construed by our Supreme Court many times, from the time of John Marshall down. In the Legal Tender cases (12 Wallace, 457, 538), the court, in the opinion by Mr. Justice Strong, says:

> Happily the true meaning of the clause authorizing the enactment of all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the express powers conferred upon Congress, and all other powers vested in the United States, or in any of its departments or officers, has long since been settled.
> It was, however, in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland that the fullest consideration was given to this clause in the Constitution granting auxiliary powers, and a construction adopted that has ever since been accepted as determining its true meaning. We shall not go over the ground there trodden. It is familiar to the legal profession, and indeed to the whole country. Suffice it to say, in that case it was finally settled that in the gift by the Constitution to Congress of authority to enact laws "necessary and proper" for the execution of all the powers created by it, the necessity spoken of is not to be understood as an absolute one. On the contrary, this court then held that the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Said Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court: "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

The gentleman from North Carolina referred to the minutes of the convention which framed our Constitution, stating that it will plainly appear from them that the power to make peace is not a legislative power. The minutes of the convention for August 17, 1787, when this section was adopted, throw little light on the question. Everything disclosed by the minutes will be quoted:

> "The question being taken to strike out the word 'make,' it was passed in the affirmative. Yeas: Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia—8. Nay: New Hampshire—1.
> "It was moved and seconded to add the words 'and to make peace,' to the 14th clause; which passed unanimously in the negative."

From the report of the proceedings in Elliott's Debates, it appears that Mr. Pinckney opposed originally the vesting of the power to make war in the legislature upon the ground that it would meet but once a year; and he further said: "It would be singular for one authority to make war and another peace."

After some discussion by Pierce Butler, of South Carolina, with Messrs. Madison, Gerry, and Sherman as to the desirability of permitting the Executive to make war, and of the difference in meaning of the words make and declare, Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, afterwards Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, remarked that "There is a material difference between the cases of making war and making peace. It should be more easy to get out of war than into it. War, also, is a simple and overt declaration; peace, attended with intricate and secret negotiations."

Mr. Mason was against giving the power of war to the Executive, because not safely to be trusted with it; or to the Senate, because not so constructed as to be entitled to it. He was for clogging, rather than facilitating war, but for facilitating peace. He preferred "declare" to "make."

"On the motion for adding 'and peace' after 'war,' it was unanimously negatived."

It is greatly to be regretted that the report of this debate is so meager, but from this report it is plainly apparent that what the delegates had in mind was the fact that the Congress met but once in a year, and that the delegates adopted the views of Chief Justice Ellsworth, briefly but forcibly expressed, that "it should be more easy to get out of war than into it," and those stated by George Mason, of Virginia, that he was for clogging rather than facilitating war, but for facilitating peace.

The framers of the Constitution were great men and well-informed men. To this day their names are household words throughout the Union, and they were men thoroughly posted in international as well as domestic law. It will not do to attribute to them ignorance of the law.

At the time of the meeting of the convention the best-known authorities on international law in the colonies were the works of Hugo Grotius (1623) and that of Vattel (1758). From Grotius I quote:

> The person who has authority to begin a war is the only one to whom the right of making peace can properly belong, according to the general maxim that everyone is the best judge in the management of his own affairs. From hence it follows that public war can be made by the sovereign power alone on each side, a right which in every kingly Government is very justly vested in the Crown.
> In popular or aristocratic forms of government the right of making war or concluding peace is generally lodged in some public council or body, where a majority of voices may form treaties, conventions, or resolutions which will be binding on the dissentient part of such council. All who are bound by a peace, whether approving it or not, are entitled to its benefits. (Grotius, Rights of War and Peace, Ch. XX.)

To much the same effect is the statement in Vattel, Book IV, chapter 2.

It would plainly appear from these authorities that under the views held at the time, the power of making peace was necessarily incident to the power of declaring war.

The Constitution grants to the Congress the power to declare war, and also to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, and to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, and out of abundant caution "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

Let us consider these words of authority and, not forgetting the construction given them by our great Chief Justice, and ever since constantly adhered to by the Supreme Court, decide for ourselves whether at the conclusion of a war, declared by the Congress, a declaration of peace is not necessary and proper. I repeat the words of the Chief Justice:

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution; and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

In 2,000 years the great principle laid down by Aristotle, the most eminent of philosophers, "The goal of war is peace," is still the rule of all civilized nations.

The cases cited by the gentleman from North Carolina do not bear out his contention.

The gentleman from North Carolina discussed two cases, one of which was the case of the United States v. Anderson (9 Wall., 56, 70), which, like three or four other cases of the same sort, was based upon the necessity of having the Supreme Court decide at what time the Civil War ended. In that case—the report of which I have here and from which I shall not read, a case in Ninth Wallace—the Supreme Court drew attention to the fact that President Johnson, in August, 1866, had issued a proclamation of peace, and coupled with that the statement that the Congress had ratified this by the act of March 2, 1867. It appears that Congress was not in session and had not authorized the proclamation of peace, but that it was afterwards ratified.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. The Hijo case grew out of the Spanish War, and all that was decided in that is that a condition of peace did not exist between the time of the armistice and the final treaty. I have the discussion, which will be found in the One hundred and ninety-fourth United States. There was no condition of peace between Spain and the United States during the period intervening between the armistice and the final treaty of peace. That is all there is in that case.

On the other hand, I have a case in Ninth Howard, decided by a unanimous court at a time when Mr. Taney was Chief Justice and wrote the opinion. The case referred to is the case referred to by the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee in his argument on Saturday. It was a case involving the importation of goods from Mexico at a time when Tampico, a Mexican port, was in our possession during the Mexican War. In that case the Chief Justice says, speaking of the right of the United States to annex territory—and I shall not read as much as I would like to, because my time is short:

> But this can be done only by the treaty-making power or by legislative authority, and is not a part of the power conferred on the President by the declaration of war.

That has been followed up by the Federal court in a case in which the language which I shall read has been three times quoted with approval by respectable courts. In the case of the United States v. One hundred and twenty-nine Packages (27 Federal Cases), Judge Samuel Treat, of Missouri, was called upon to decide this great question in the light of Chief Justice Taney's opinion, and he did decide it, and I read his words, as follows:

> In short, the status of the country as to peace or war is legally determined by the political and not the judicial department. When the decision is made, the courts are concluded thereby and bound to apply the legal rules which belong to that condition. The same power which determines the state of war or insurrection must also decide when hostilities have ceased; that is, when peace is restored. In a legal sense the state of war or peace is not a question in pais for courts to determine; it is a legal fact ascertainable only from the decision of the political department.

That was decided in 1862, almost immediately following the decision by Chief Justice Taney in 1850. A dozen or more authorities from the Supreme Court are then cited. That case has been followed and the exact language quoted in United States v. Bales (27 Fed. Cas., 325, 328), a Michigan case, by Judge Emmons, of the Federal circuit court. It has never been overruled; it has never been spoken of with disrespect. It was followed as late as 1906 by Judge Lewis, of Colorado, in the case of Moyer v. Peabody (148 Fed., 871), and the exact language given by Judge Treat is used by Judge Lewis. In conclusion, I read from a case in the Supreme Court of Indiana, quoting the language of Judge Treat (Perkins v. Rogers, 35 Ind., 124, 167; 9 Am. Rep., 639, 664, 674):

> The war-making power is by the Constitution vested in Congress, and the President has no power to declare war or conclude peace except as he may be empowered by Congress.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, we readily concede that there has been and is now a persistent, nation-wide, righteous demand for peace. We regret that the Republican leaders have been so long in hearing that demand, and that even now they hear it so indistinctly. We warn them that this miserable makeshift will not meet or satisfy that demand. The reason that some of us are opposed to this resolution is because we are earnestly in favor of real peace. We believe this resolution will simply result in additional delay, procrastination, and a complication of conditions. As has been stated already, and which has not been seriously controverted, the question of political expediency is undoubtedly entering very largely into the introduction and consideration of this resolution and will influence the action of a great many. In fact, some of the individual Members have admitted that although they have no confidence in the virtue or efficacy of the resolution, yet they are going to support it from the standpoint of political expediency. One Member stated on this floor that although he detested this resolution, yet he was going to support it, and advised other Members to do so upon the ground that our constituents would misunderstand and misconstrue a vote against it. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I have a higher opinion than that of the wisdom and ultimate judgment of my constituents, and, in the second place, I think that those who are disposed to follow a lead of that kind are misconstruing and misrepresenting the so-called "verdict of last November." Several Members have spoken as if the verdict last November was in favor of this so-called peace resolution. I respectfully submit that it was not in favor of peace by any sort of resolution.

The Republican platform nowhere mentions a separate peace or a peace resolution, although the Knox peace resolution had passed Congress and was vetoed, the excuse given then for such a resolution being that we had a Democratic President, who was unwilling to join hands with the majority in the Senate. Even that excuse does not obtain now, because the Republicans are in complete control. As just stated, there is not a word in the Republican platform adopted at Chicago with regard to a separate peace with Germany or a peace resolution. On the other hand, in the said Republican platform the section dealing with the League of Nations and the question of making peace starts out with this sentence:

> The Republican Party stands for agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world.

And it concludes with this sentence:

> We pledge the coming Republican administration to such agreements with the other nations of the world as shall meet the full duty of America to civilization and humanity in accordance with American ideals—

And so forth.

The issue, in so far as the League of Nations and the question of peace making entered into the last campaign, is very correctly stated in a recent editorial in the Washington Evening Star, which is a Republican paper and very friendly to the present administration. In discussing these peace resolutions the said editorial declares:

> Much weight has been attributed to the answer of the American people in the "solemn referendum" of last November, and it should be borne in mind that the question then before the Nation was not "Do you prefer the treaty of Versailles to a separate peace with Germany?" but "Do you prefer the treaty of Versailles with or without those reservations which the Republican Party deems necessary?"

This editorial concludes in this wise:

> Scrapping the treaty of Versailles would be unwise in the extreme. It is difficult to believe that such a course is to be finally adopted by the administration.

In another recent editorial in the Washington Evening Star, under the title "The 'Separate Peace' Again," it is stated:

> Interest in the action of the Senate on Saturday, when the Knox resolution was passed, centers in the revival by Senator LODGE of talk concerning a separate peace with Germany.
> "If we choose to make peace with Germany by a treaty, which will probably follow this resolution," said Mr. LODGE, "surely we are not betraying them." By "them" he referred to the powers with whom we were associated in the war.
>
> So out of the passage of the denatured Knox resolution—a gesture which accomplished nothing more than the declaration of the fact that we are no longer in armed conflict with Germany—are reborn the grave misgivings which, prior to President Harding's impressive first message to Congress, beset America and those with whom we fought shoulder to shoulder in France. It is the purpose of the United States, while insisting upon the rights which have been guaranteed it under the treaty of Versailles, to dodge the complementary obligations and, making a separate and selfish bargain with Germany, to bid our former allies to do the best they can without us in the difficulties into which our course would plunge them?
> Far from being authorized to scrap the treaty of Versailles by the unqualified verdict of last November, the Republican Party is bound by that verdict to cling to whatever is good in the League of Nations and to ratify a modified version of the treaty of Versailles. Seeking the political control of the Nation for the next four years, talk, by any save an extreme few, of a separate peace with Germany was noticeable only by its absence. President Harding is aware of the resulting obligation—of the fact that the Nation as a whole would regard such a step as one of unwisdom and dishonor.

These editorials are representative of innumerable other editorials which have appeared in Republican and independent as well as Democratic newspapers throughout the United States prior to, during, and since the last campaign. In fact, during the recent campaign the Literary Digest sent out questionnaires and took a poll of practically all the daily newspapers in the United States, from which it appeared that an insignificant percentage of such papers favored "scrapping" the treaty of Versailles and the covenant of the League of Nations, they nearly all declaring in favor of either the peace treaty without change or with mild reservations or with the Lodge reservations.

On October 15, some 17 days before the election last November, 31 very prominent Republicans, including two who are now members of President Harding's Cabinet, Charles E. Hughes and Herbert Hoover, gave out a statement in which they told the friends of a League of Nations that the best way, the most effective way, to procure it was to support President Harding, on the ground that he was for the League of Nations with reservations, for which he had voted as a Senator, and that he could work in harmony with the Senate, which, it was claimed, would certainly be Republican. After quoting at length from the Republican and Democratic platforms, both candidates for President, and other authorities, that statement stated the issues in the following language:

> The question accordingly is not between a league and no league, but is whether certain provisions in the proposed league agreement shall be accepted unchanged or shall be changed.
> The question between the candidates is not whether our country shall join in such an association. It is whether we shall join under an agreement containing the exact provisions negotiated by President Wilson at Paris or under an agreement which omits or modifies some of those provisions that are very objectionable to great numbers of the American people.

That was likewise the attitude of all the Republican "spellbinders" during the campaign, with the exception of a few "bitter-enders." The controversy hinges around a question of reservations. The Republican fight was directed against certain features of the covenant of the League of Nations. Practically nobody advocated rejection of the peace treaty itself, and I never heard of anybody at that time insisting that it would be the policy of the Republican Party to make a separate peace with the enemy.

Consequently, a scrutiny of the actual issues involved in the last campaign discloses the fact that the so-called "verdict of last November" was against a separate peace and against an effort to make peace by resolution. These facts should be borne in mind by those Members who are hunting for political cover and who are so anxious to cast a vote of expediency. For their further consideration, I commend another editorial which recently appeared in the Washington Herald, which is in part owned by a member of President Harding's Cabinet, and which is very friendly to the present administration. In discussing the question of the peace resolution and that of a separate peace, this editorial stated:

> Any suggestion of a separate treaty with Germany is but to put false hope and an added false stubbornness and unrepentance into the heads of the German leaders.
> Such a peace would not affect the treaty of Versailles. That would still be there and would still bind Germany. Such a peace would not give this Government any authority or influence as to the provisions of that other treaty; it could not change or modify it in any way. It would range this country alongside of Germany and permanently apart from people with whose armies our Army fought side by side in the war. It would be both a disastrous and disgraceful position, creditable to neither our common sense nor to our moral sense.
> If the Republican Party should undertake such a peace, deserting our war associates, the Democrats would have their time of squaring accounts, and if such a treaty got the required two-thirds vote the Republicans would pay the penalty in 1923.

I fully agree that politics and partisanship should have played no part in making peace, but politics and partisanship were injected into it, both in the Senate and in the House, not by the Democrats but by the Republicans. Under the Democratic administration and under the matchless leadership of Woodrow Wilson politics and partisanship were laid aside, all parties combined in marshaling the resources of the Nation to combat Prussianism. Under the inspiring example of President Wilson the Nation was gripped with patriotism. However, as soon as the war was fought and won, and while we were seeking to make secure the fruits of our victory, certain Republican leaders began to play politics in order to destroy the prestige of President Wilson.

The policy now being pursued by the Republicans can not be indicted in any stronger terms than by employing the language used by some of the Republican leaders before they began to play politics in connection with the important question of peace making. The present Republican leader of the Senate and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee [Senator LODGE] publicly proclaimed that any proposition for a separate peace with Germany would make us "guilty of the blackest crime." Again, in the Forum Magazine of June, 1918, Senator LODGE said:

> If we send our armies and young men abroad to be killed and wounded in northern France and Flanders with no result but this, our entrance into war with such an intention was a crime which nothing can justify. The intent of Congress and the intent of the President was that there should be no peace until we could create a situation where no such war as this could recur. We can not make peace except in company with our allies. It would brand us with everlasting dishonor and bring ruin to us also if we undertook to make a separate peace.

This Porter resolution is much preferable to the Knox resolution, not because it is any more effective but simply because it is less dishonorable in its phraseology. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

However, there is nothing—there has been nothing since March 4—to prevent President Harding from proceeding in the regular, orderly, constitutional way toward making peace through the instrumentality of a peace treaty, whether he desired to take the treaty of Versailles as a basis or to make an entirely new and separate peace with Germany. There is positively no reason whatever for not taking as a basis the treaty of Versailles, which has already been signed by all of our late associates and allies as well as by the enemy countries, even though President Harding and the Republican Senate are unwilling to accept it in its entirety. In discussing his own proposed reservations to the peace treaty, Senator LODGE said:

> The other nations will take us at our own terms, for without us their league is a wreck and all their gains from a victorious peace imperiled.

And yet he and the other Republican leaders now refuse to join hands with our allies "at our own terms," even though "all their gains from a victorious peace be imperiled." That statement was sordid and repulsive enough, but the present policy is more so.

After having been in complete power for more than three months they now offer this subterfuge. Having repudiated the treaty of Versailles, this resolution proposes to cling to all the advantages therein contained. They propose to shirk all the obligations and responsibilities imposed upon each of the nations who signed the treaty of Versailles, but to reserve all the benefits; to grab everything and give nothing in return. They propose to reap where we do not sow. Although we are the wealthiest and most powerful Nation on earth, yet you are unwilling for us to play a manly part.

I deny that such a policy constitutes "Americanism." [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is blind selfishness, cowardice, and dishonor parading in the guise of "Americanism." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This policy is very pleasing to Germany, but very displeasing to all of our allies. One Member made a very pathetic appeal to the Democratic Members of the House to support this resolution. If he is seeking votes, I suggest that he submit the resolution to the German Reichstag, where it would receive a unanimous vote; however, it would receive no votes in any of the legislative assemblies of our late allies.

I repeat that the verdict of last November was not as some would construe it. There is less reason now for supporting a resolution of this kind than there was when it was presented before. The time will inevitably come when the course of the last administration and the minority members of this Committee on Foreign Affairs in regard to this matter will be fully vindicated. Some of us are very much in favor of peace, but we are opposed to cowardly deserting the Allies at the front door and seeking to sneak into the international back door. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Will the gentleman from Virginia use some of his time?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have heard many remarkable arguments advanced in favor of this legislative stillbirth now under consideration, but I think the most remarkable was that to which we listened on last Saturday by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], in which he undertook to justify the action here proposed on the ground that the Allies had deserted the United States by making separate peace with Germany and thus forced us into a position where we had to shift for ourselves. Such an argument would be ludicrous if it were not tragic. It approaches what I used to know in college as a pons asinorum.

I presume he would have had the allied nations wait indefinitely to ratify a treaty all had agreed on, while the Republican Party played miserable politics with it. The condition of mankind is sad enough at best, but its condition would have been unthinkable if all the other nations had pursued the venal and humiliating course which the Republican Party has compelled this Nation to take. The United States was left, is left now, to shift for itself. But it was not abandoned and compelled to shift for itself by England, or by France, or Italy, or Belgium, or Japan, or any other nation; but the United States Government and people have been put in the humiliating position of having to shift for themselves by the mendacity of Republican leadership during the past two and a half years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In his speech of August 28, 1920, Senator Harding, the Republican candidate then for President, stated that whatever good there might be in the league covenant should be used in any association of nations that he himself might attempt to form. He stated that if there were teeth in the league and no teeth in his association or in the old discredited Hague tribunal, the teeth in the league covenant might be transferred to the association or the tribunal. In other words, what he then advocated was the extraction of the teeth from the toothsome league and insert them in his toothless association.

In his inaugural address on April 12 he stated that this Government would have no part in the present league, with its "world government" and its "superpowers." But he urged the ratification of the Versailles treaty with such reservations as he might deem proper to preserve our independent action. In other words, we would go in, while at the same time attempting and pretending to stay out.

In a statement issued by Mr. Herbert Hoover, now Secretary of Commerce, on February 28, 1920, when he was a sort of omnibus candidate for the Republican and Democratic nominations for President, he made the following assertion:

If the treaty goes over to the presidential election, then I must support the party that stands for the league.

In an interview in the Washington Star on March 18, 1918, Mr. Hoover made the following statement:

If we abandon this treaty, we must ask Germany to negotiate a separate peace with us. Having thus isolated ourselves from the Allies and withdrawn any consequential army from Europe, can we suppose that Germany will accept the Versailles terms from us? Will we resume fighting again? We shall be in the position of a nation which has abandoned its allies after having made an agreement with them, for the main lines of the treaty, as distinguished from the league, are not challenged even by reservations. Will not the Germans thus effectively drive a cleavage between us and the Allies? As the Reparation Commission can effectually veto any settlement we make with Germany for civilian losses, alien property, and trade matters, shall we go to the Allies and ask their help?

In a carefully prepared statement, published in the New York Evening Post, June 25, 1920, Mr. Hoover said:

The treaty of Versailles is the guaranty of the disarmament of our great autocracies, and no European nation is going to risk their revival. It is a mortgage upon the enemy States, and they are not going to offer opportunity to Germany, Austria, Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria to escape their debts by intrigue at a new peace conference. The European signatory nations will take no risks of seeing chaos from these causes.

The League of Nations covenant is an essential part of the treaty.

A separate peace involves a series of negotiations from a disadvantageous position, not only with the enemy but with all the new States that have been created and with each of the Allies and the neutrals who have joined the league. I leave the legal phases of this to the lawyers, but I point out some prohibitive reasons—the treaty of Versailles is the web that holds Europe together to-day.

It embraces a vast network of economic clauses that vitally concern our economic well-being. The execution of these clauses is in progress at the hands of a commission practically controlling the economic future of the enemy States. This economic future can be guided impartially in the interest of the whole world, or in the interest of a few States, and thus against us. Its present attitude is of the latter character. No treaty between ourselves and the enemy States can admit us to this control, for that depends upon our late Allies. If we enter the reparation commission, we can only do it by ratifying the treaty. Statesmanship looking to a separate peace is plain foolishness, and worse.

Whether it be to-day or 10 years hence, we will, if we want peace, ratify the Treaty of Versailles in some form.

Will any Republican denounce that statement as untrue? If it was true when made by the great Secretary of Commerce, is it any less true now?

In a statement issued by thirty-one prominent Republican advocates of the League of Nations, on October 15, 1920, in which they urged friends of the league to vote for Mr. Harding, and which was signed by Mr. Hughes, now Secretary of State, Mr. Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Root, former Secretary of War, Secretary of State, and United States Senator, and many other prominent Republicans, we find the following language:

The question accordingly is not between a league and no league, but it is whether certain provisions in the proposed league agreement shall be accepted unchanged or shall be changed.

And these men pledged Mr. Harding to a course of action which would result in the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles and the creation of a league of nations embodying the general principles of the league already in existence, with certain modifications which they set forth.

Did they know what they were talking about? Did they speak with Mr. Harding's consent and knowledge? It is hardly conceivable that they would have issued that statement without consulting him. Two of them are now members of the President's cabinet. Are they of the same opinion now? If not, what has happened to change their views?

In a speech delivered at the commencement exercises of the University of Pennsylvania by Senator KNOX, he used the following language:

We have reached a point when it is evident the future holds in store a time when wars shall cease; when the nations of the earth shall realize a federation as real and vital as that now subsisting between the component parts of single States; when by deliberate international conjunction the strong shall universally help the weak; and when the corporate righteousness of the world shall compel unrighteousness to disappear and shall destroy the habitations of cruelty lingering in the dark places of the earth.

It is doubtful whether any stronger argument or statement was ever issued by any man, publicly or privately, in behalf of the League of Nations.

In a speech delivered in the Senate on December 21, 1918, Senator LODGE said:

If the peace with Germany is to be durable terms must be exacted which will make it impossible for Germany to break out again upon the world with a war of conquest. It is the duty of the Allies and the United States to meet and determine what terms they will impose upon Germany. When this is done the first great step will be taken toward the establishment of the world's peace. * * * Nothing can be done unless we work in complete harmony with those who are associated with us in the war against the Central Powers. I know very well we had no treaty of alliance technically with the Allies, but technicalities are of no consequence in the presence of facts. * * * We must have common action now in making the peace as we had in carrying on the war, and this unity between us and the Allies is the first essential condition for a successful peace.

That was the language of HENRY CABOT LODGE before the Republican Party decided to stultify itself for political purposes, before that party had decided to leave this Nation to shift for itself and pick up whatever crumbs might be left at the international table after the other nations secure their rights under the Versailles treaty.

George Harvey, who is alleged to be a great colonel, but is acknowledged to be a poor ambassador, says we went to war to save our skins. HENRY CABOT LODGE said in that speech in the Senate that "we went to war to save civilization." But whether we went to war to save civilization or merely our skins, the legislative monstrosity now before this House does neither. If we went to war to save our skins, we ought not to leave them nailed to the barn door by surrendering all the rights we obtained as a result of the war. If we went to war to save civilization, we ought not to outrage that civilization by a dishonorable desertion of every impulse which actuated us in the conflict and every noble purpose for which we sacrificed so much in life and treasure.

We have been told that this resolution will restore peace. We can not enforce its terms upon Germany. Will it automatically result in the exchange of ambassadors? If so, we may never have a treaty of peace settling the questions growing out of the war. Can we reserve under this resolution rights in the Versailles treaty, which we have never ratified? Does anybody suppose that if we have to negotiate a new treaty with Germany we can do it otherwise than as two peaceful nations negotiating with each other? To suppose otherwise is to set at naught human nature and human history. And if Germany shall refuse to negotiate a treaty with us acknowledging her responsibility for the war, and acknowledging her obligation to reimburse our Nation and our citizens for the unlawful destruction of lives and property, how can we force her to do it? Will we again break off diplomatic relations and resume the status of war which this resolution seeks to dissolve?

Not having ratified the treaty of Versailles, the status at present is prescribed by the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918. It is under that armistice that our troops are in the occupied territory of Germany. An armistice is defined to be a "temporary suspension of hostilities between two nations at war." If this resolution shall, as its defenders claim, result in restoring the status of peace, then the armistice falls with it, for there can be no such thing as an armistice between two nations at peace.

Therefore, under any circumstances, under either horn of the dilemma which this resolution places this Nation in, we are left at a disadvantage. We are shorn of the fruits of victory and will be compelled to beg Germany for such terms of peace as she shall be pleased to grant us and as the Allies will permit us to have.

The American people are growing restless and anxious to know what the foreign policy of this administration is to be and by whom it is to be announced.

Before the election, two members of the present Cabinet, Secretary of State Hughes and Secretary of Commerce Hoover, signed a statement issued to the American people, saying that the only way to get a league of nations was to elect Harding. He was elected, and they are in his Cabinet. When are we to have a definite announcement? Have they changed their minds? Were they mistaken? Mr. Harding in his inaugural address said this Nation would have nothing to do with the league; then, in his address to Congress, he said he would favor the ratification of the Versailles treaty with suitable reservations. Mr. Hoover says the league is the heart of the treaty and both must stand or fall together. Mr. Hughes said in a letter to Senator HALE that he thought the best thing to do was to ratify the treaty, with certain reservations, which he outlined. Mr. Taft has many times said the same. So have Root, Wickersham, and other able Republicans. But our distinguished colonel, who occupies but does not fill the position of ambassador to England, assures the world that we will have nothing to do with the treaty—openly, secretly, directly, indirectly, in the daytime or the nighttime, world without end. Amen.

Who speaks for this administration? Is it President Harding? Is it Hughes? Is it Hoover? Is it LODGE? Is it KNOX? Is it PORTER? Is it Harvey? The American people are disposed to be patient and long-suffering, but they would like to hear some responsible voice on this great subject. It has been six months since the election, and more than three since the 4th of March. If it is proposed to ratify the Versailles treaty, why has it not been resubmitted to the Senate? If it is proposed to negotiate a new and separate treaty with Germany, why has it not begun? The American people want peace. We all want peace—real peace, enduring peace—and we want to restore our friendly relations with Germany. But the American people want an honorable and upright peace, a peace which our fighting men won on land and sea, a peace that will restore our beloved Nation to its proper place in the vanguard of nations, a peace which will leave no stain of cowardice or betrayal upon our fair escutcheon. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MONTOYA].

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, I am very much gratified and honored to be here to-day as one of the Members of the Congress privileged to take part in this important question. I bring up, it seems, the rear guard of the discussion.

The people of my State, when by resolution of the Congress a declaration of war was made, were ready and eager to go to war for the Nation and the flag. And now, at this moment, I, as the lone Representative of that great State, say that we are just as eager on this 13th day of June, 1921, by the same action that declared war, to declare the end of the war by means of the Porter resolution. Gentlemen, I have very carefully listened to the arguments on both sides, the very able and brilliant arguments made by the minority side and the majority side, upon this great and momentous question. But it appeared to me that we were running in circles, the same as the seats in this House, and always in the course of the argument landed under the dome of the Capitol of the Nation, and under the Constitution of the United States, which gives the power and the right to Congress to declare war or to declare peace. I am here, gentlemen, to vote in behalf of the people of my State to declare the war at an end.

The Porter resolution declaring peace with the Governments of Germany and Austria-Hungary should have been passed months ago, for we have been in actual state of peace for over two years; but owing to an unexpected and unforeseen situation as to the treaty of peace, called the the treaty of Versailles, being complicated with an agreement framed by the Allies called the League of Nations, the treaty and the declaration of peace have been up in the air for many months, and waited for the decision of the American people at the polls in November, 1920, which decision was given in thundering tones by over 7,000,000 votes majority, defeating the so-called League of Nations and its dangerous purport in entangling the United States directly and permanently in European affairs.

This decision left the matter to be dealt with by Congress, under the Constitution, for Congress has the sole power of declaring war or proclaiming peace. This question is here now, under a proper ruling adopted by the House, to be disposed of, not as a political question, political expediency, or any other camouflage or subterfuge, but as an open question of right, of justice, demanded by the American people and the world. Why should this proposition hang fire any longer? Why should it meet with any delay or opposition from any Member either of the minority or majority of this House?

We went into the war for the most potent and just reasons in the world, our honor as a Nation, the honor and prestige of our glorious flag, the Stars and Stripes, was at stake; we had been insulted; our men and women and children had been murdered on the high seas, not by orders of the German masses or common people, for they had very little to say under a despotic government, but it was done by the autocratic, ambitious, crazy power of the ruler and his despotic government.

The measure was filled, America made its decision, we accepted the gage, our boys by the hundreds of thousands, by the millions, responded to the call of the country and flag, our legions were formed under able leaders, 2,000,000 soldiers went across, united with the Allies for home and the liberty of humanity from the ambitions of tyrants; you all know the rest; you have heard of the Thermopylæ of the war, Chateau-Thierry, Belleau Wood, the Argonne, Verdun, St. Mihiel drive, and the hundreds of places, now historic and consecrated ground where the blood of Americans was shed for the noblest cause in the world, ancient or modern, for the liberty of humanity from oppression and vassalage by unprincipled, crazy tyrants.

The American troops, once in action, the American flag once moving forward against the enemy, never retreated—such a word is not known in our Army in America or elsewhere—but went forward, pierced, and broke to Hades the so-called impregnable Hindenburg line, went over the top everywhere, and in a few short weeks helped to land the Kaiser on the chain gang and into a wood pile in Belgium, as he deserved, and worse. Some of the newspapers are saying that there may be a "nigger in that wood pile," but I do not believe it. They will have to assign his majesty to one of our western forests when the wood gives out in little Holland. We will give him a couple of sections and keep him busy the rest of his natural life.

Now, the job is done. What next? Let us have peace. Let us have peace with the German people. The world and they are rid of the main causes of the Great War. Let us have peace; let us declare it now by voting for the Porter resolution declaring peace.

New Mexico, like every other State in the Union, in proportion to population was ready at the front when the call was made. We had no willful slackers in my State; we had a few conscientious objectors, but I as chairman of the draft board where they appeared took no stock in their claims. I asked them, "Are you satisfied with this country; are you happy with your families in this country; are you protected by our institutions and flag? Then, my boys, go and fight for that country and flag that protects you." And they went. On their return, I have met many of them, and they are the happiest of men, because I decided that they should wear the American uniform. I, as an American, in common thought with the American people and with our President, who from his inmost heart has said at the memorial held for our dead heroes: "This must not be; war must not be." Let us have peace; let us have peace, not the peace of conquest, not the peace of the grave wrought by mighty armies in devastation, death, tears, and suffering, but peace as proposed in the United States, by common consent of the leading nations of the world, headed by America, a peace by disarmament by turning to the paths of peace and forgetting war. This can be done and will be done, because the mothers of America and of the world are backing the movement.

As New Mexico was to the front when called to arms, New Mexico, by its Representative, is proud to be at the finish, bringing up the rear guard in declaring peace.

Let us follow the teachings of the Christ, whose salutation on all occasions, public or private, as the good book teaches us, was: "Pax vobis"—"Peace be with you." Let us have peace. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, on April 12 President Harding appeared before a joint session of Congress and delivered a message that has gone down in history as one of the notable state papers of the Nation. In that document this paragraph appeared:

> To establish a state of technical peace without further delay, I should approve a declaratory resolution of Congress to that effect, with the qualifications essential to protect our rights. Such resolution should undertake to do no more than thus declare the state of peace which all America craves.

America craves a return to peace that will permit of the resumption of full commercial relations with the Central Powers, and the overwhelmingly large vote cast for the entire Republican ticket last fall was an expression of the people's determination to bring about a technical state of peace at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Speaker, the world is war sick, and the fever of unrest prevailing everywhere is but a manifestation of its weariness. The great nations are groaning under heavy taxes that will continue to weigh down mankind for generations not yet born. "Give us peace and prosperity" is a cry that daily issues from the throat of humanity, and in passing this resolution, which formally proclaims the ending of the state of war, we are heeding the anguished cry of a world writhing in mortal agony. I only wish to God that this step could have been taken right after the signing of the peace treaty at Versailles. Think of the misery and suffering it would have obviated. The failure to do so can not be charged to Congress, for we passed a resolution 18 months ago declaring the state of war to be over, only to have it vetoed by that cold and stubborn man who then occupied the White House. He would have no peace save his kind of peace, but when the great American people were given an opportunity to express their desires they rose en masse and proclaimed their abhorence of foreign entanglements and alien intrigue. They remembered the admonition delivered by the immortal Washington in his Farewell Address and proclaimed their faith in the wisdom of the policy enunciated by the Father of his Country.

Great Britain, France, Belgium, and the other allied powers have long since concluded formal peace and resumed commercial relations with Germany and Austria. Only the United States has failed to do so. Think of the tremendous loss in trade that our failure to act has cost us. To-day factories are shut down in every part of the country, several millions are out of employment, farmers are compelled to sell their products at a great loss, and actual want and suffering is the lot of all too many who are in no way responsible for conditions now existing. With the immortal Grant I say, "Let us have peace." Let us resume full relations with the Central Powers that we may find a market for our surplus products. Until we do so the pendulum will not swing toward normalcy and prosperity.

Last summer I went to Europe for the purpose of studying conditions in the war-torn regions of that Continent. After a careful study of conditions there I arrived at the conclusion that one of the first requisites to the revival of normal times in this country was the restoration of Germany and Austria to positions where they could help themselves and promptly pay the indemnities exacted of them by the victors.

That I am not alone in my conclusions is proven by an article which appeared in Barron's financial paper, published at Boston under date of June 6 this year, written from Berlin by its publisher, C. W. Barron, under the title "European unsettlements." Mr. Barron says in part:

EUROPEAN UNSETTLEMENTS—LOOKING INTO GERMANY.

I canvassed the German situation carefully with the Swiss bankers, for this was the object of my trip into Switzerland. Summarized, the findings were as follows:

"Whatever may be our feelings, Germany can not be wiped out. The Germans have passed through these trials before. They had the Thirty Years' War and the Seven Years' War. They can be reduced, but they can not be extinguished.

"The military party is quietly in control, but the Hohenzollerns will never come back. You can feel that the Germans are not at heart democrats. It will take a generation to change the spirit of a Germany brought up under military rule, and it will take two generations for the Germans to think for themselves politically. But despotism is broken down.

HELPING THE WORLD.

"To help the world we must help Germany; the whole body suffers because Germany is so important a member. The patient is Europe, and at first examination his heart is very weak. Strengthen that and the other organs will get strong. We don't say it out of love, but Germany is the heart of Europe.

"From a business standpoint, we must remember that Germany is the only country that paid its bills at maturity during the war and never defaulted. Italy and France suspended payment.

"The German is a good spender when he has money and takes naturally to motor cars and champagne. He is also a good family man and a good father, and except for this damned kaiserism has good common sense, is hard-working and intelligent.

ONLY GERMANY CAN REORGANIZE RUSSIA.

"Whether Germany makes war again will depend upon the opportunity that offers. You must force Germany to pay, and the English and the French need not fear the settlements.

"The Germans are the only people with location and ability to put order back in Russia, and if Germany is set going again she will look to Russia for profitable development rather than to western competition.

"The Germans will colonize industrially in Russia, and they are the only people to do it. The only hope for Russia is through commerce.

"Settle up this reparations business and the Germans will work like the devil. Their factories are blazing now, but they can do a good deal more, and they have much yet to do for themselves."

WAR PLANS FALLACIOUS.

I did not care to enter Germany by the railway train. I wanted to see the people off the usual routes of travel and out of contact with foreigners or officialdom. Therefore, after crossing Switzerland east and west and north and south, and getting a peep into Italy and the Swiss views of Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Russia, I dropped down the Rhine Valley and into the Black Forest by motor.

The roads were surprisingly good, but I was astonished to be able to read the history of the war 30 months after the armistice right in the faces and limbs of the men, women, and children.

The German children have not the ruddy complexions of the English or the vivacity of the French, but in previous years I have always found them rugged and sturdy of limb. My observations from Basel to Berlin clearly convinced me that the outside world was utterly wrong concerning Germany.

NO FIGHT IN GERMANY.

It will be a span of more than one generation before Germany can ever fight again with her own men. Her man power is gone and can not be reproduced in a generation. Not for 30 years can she contemplate war, and then another 30 years would be required to prepare for it.

My first trip to Germany was more than 40 years ago, and on many trips abroad in the 15 years preceding the war I spent more time in Germany than any other country. When I left Paris I had no special ambition to visit Berlin. But I knew well the Rhine Valley, its fields, villages, and little trout streams descending from the Black Forest, and the narrow streets by the watercourses where the children ran barefooted or clicked their wooden shoes against the stones.

In 1911 I saw the war program in railroads, training camps, and finance, and published that Germany was preparing for a great war in Europe.

THE PHYSICAL FACTS.

In 1913 I flew down the Rhine Valley toward Frankfort in a Zeppelin, and later declared from a study of the financial situation in Berlin that Germany could not afford to go to war, as it was now solidified in finance, shipping, and mercantile organization, with prospect, fairer than had ever before beckoned any country, to move forward in the peaceful contest of supplying and expanding human wants.

I had to note the silver in the Spandau Tower—the stirrup cup of war—expanded from 120,000,000 to 360,000,000 marks and the war tax levy upon the capital of the country. Yet for 40 years following the war with France, Germany had been rattling the sword and steadily gaining in trade and finance. She could gain no more by war.

I am not now talking from financial or business logic but from physical facts.

READING WAR HISTORY.

There is no camouflage concerning the pinched legs of the children of the upper Rhine which told me the primary truth. If the children have been pinched in that rich valley, they can not be better off toward Vienna.

You can read the history of the war in the faces of the people as well as in the little legs of the children 30 months after the armistice. You can then understand the desperate game that Germany played with her women and children after the first defeat at the Battle of the Marne settled the issue. This was the first shock after England entered the war, and it was a series of shocks the next four years, with never strength enough in the man power of Germany to follow up when they broke through the line.

The English and the French not only received the shock of war in stubborn resistance, but they, too, knew that they had not strength enough to press forward. They held Germany and then they starved her. The Americans, well fed from the beginning, were the men who could take the offensive and follow through.

STARVED TO STERILITY.

The Germans put the food to the front to brace the fighting line and starved the women and children to sterility. Enter any German home, even in the upper classes, and you will find the women still pinched, shrunk, and underweight. Walk down the Unter den Linden with intention to count the war wounded and you are shocked, not at the number of one legged or one armed or disfigured, although these are more plentiful than in France or England, which conceals its hospital scars, but you are shocked at the number of idiots, the shell shocked, and the nervously strained. I not only saw them, but I had other people count them. When I asked the American journalists in Berlin for an estimate of how many people counted in the streets showed the shock of war either in limb or in countenance, they replied that they had estimated on the average every other person. In England and France they do not permit the idiotic and heavily scarred countenances to appear on the street, but Germany is not masking her appearance. She has reasons for appearing poor and weak in every respect. Therefore England and France are weaker than they appear and Germany stronger than she appears.

STILL UNDERFED AND UNDERCLAD.

Nevertheless Germany must be considered for many years as ruined in man power, child power, and mother power, but not in lands, buildings, or machinery, although the lands have been underfertilized for many years and are not now producing as formerly.

Germany imports, as before the war, one-half her food, and she is still underfed. Women and children in the streets and at the railway stations show that they are not only underfed but underclad.

Everything is "ersatz," or substitutes. The substitutes are not only in the food but in the clothing. It is paper everywhere. Not only the paper mark but the paper napkin is universal, and some of the best hotels in Germany, like the Stephanie, in Baden-Baden, use paper tablecloths. Women bring forth their babies on paper sheets, and in the railway trains you are called upon to sleep under cold, coarse burlap. If a first-class restaurant in Berlin hands you a linen napkin, you may find it marked Hamburg-American or with the name of some hotel in southern France.

When the linen supply is exhausted, there is no ability in the paper mark to buy more.

THE BASIS OF THE HATE.

England is hated because in control of the seas she gave starvation to Germany. Nobody in Germany sees what Germany did to the English and the French with the introduction of her poison gases. Germany sees only that all the men went to the front and all the best men were lost and that the women and children were starved.

Germany does not yet realize the far-reaching effect of this starvation on her future. Only the physicians understand that, and they are not talking. But if you will quietly ask them they will tell you that tens of thousands of women and girls that should now or in the future be mothers will never bear children. Years of starvation have made them sterile.

HORSE MEAT AND TURNIPS.

I met in south Germany one whom I had known many years ago in London and who, against the protest of business people, had been interned in the Isle of Wight during three years of the war. He said:

"I realized that the English had no love for the Hun. But I did not realize what starvation was until I came here after the war and found the people living on coarse turnips, with no bread and no potatoes. In Cologne they were dying of starvation. Where shops opened at 8 people were in line from 3 o'clock in the morning waiting to get a small piece of horse meat."

STILL NO MILK.

I asked one of the ablest physicians in south Germany—a man with broadest practice with most wonderful results and whom I had known for more than 10 years preceding the war—for a view of the situation as respects the physical and moral conditions preceding and following the armistice. He replied:

"For two years, 1916–1918, the people had horse meat when they could get it and bread made with horse chestnuts. There is no milk even now. The farmers will not bring it in, because it is under Government control and the farmers are rich and can sell it quietly and privately to better advantage. During the war there were no potatoes for a long time and people lived on coarse turnips, formerly fed to the cattle. One hundred grams of beef in three weeks, and of course nobody could have meat.

MORAL AND PHYSICAL DEMORALIZATION.

"There are many rich men in Germany—many more than before the war, but the people work hard and have nothing.

"During the war we had no linen for the wounded. We had to use paper. We had no sterilized silk or catgut to sew up wounds. It was a year after the war before we could get medical supplies or even soap.

"Illegitimate births increased very much during the war. Everybody above 15 was in the war. All the fathers were at the front, and the boys and girls ran wild.

"The moral status was made bad by the war. Everybody deceived, but it is now a little better. Sometimes it was impossible to send packages by post or railway. If there was anything of value it would be stolen. Now the situation is improving. Still nobody wants to work if he can avoid it. Farmers are rich and paid all their debts and they are not now ambitious to produce. They have sold their products secretly to get more money than the law allows. They can now be classed with the rich.

MIDDLE CLASS SUFFERING.

"The worst sufferers at the present time are the middle classes, teachers, professors, and salaried men. The universities and hospitals must stop and so must the schools on the present financial basis.

"Talk of war again is nonsense. The great industrial centers have been hardest hit by the war and they have been the seat of our social or bolshevik troubles. The industrial workers there see the difference between the rich and the poor, which is greater now than before the war. Some people have enormous fortunes and know how to lie and cheat the government out of its taxes.

"We can not imagine how it is possible for an American workingman to have a Ford car. Fifteen marks a day dole for unemployment in this country is not enough for a man to live on.

NO FIGHT FOR FIFTY YEARS.

"But Germany will recover in 20 to 30 years. She can not fight again for 50 years, and does not want to fight. Germany could not fight if she wanted to. It is impossible. All her best men are dead. Only young boys remain. Men who were in the war are now broken, as you can see by their faces as you walk the streets or visit the country in any part of Germany."

I turned from my friend and went over to the bank I had known before the war. I found it in larger quarters, for banking holds its own in Germany as everywhere else in the world. Of course, it was one of those big branches of the very big banks which Germany has built up. The manager said:

"We never wished war and we do not wish war now. We have no money and we have no soldiers. We have government bread cards still, but there is not enough strength in our food."

SICKENING WAR BUDGETS.

From many sources I learned that the field labor of Russian prisoners kept the Germans alive during the war, and the people of the country were sorry to have them go home. And they were sorry, too, after they got home. Only prisoners, old men, women, and children worked the fields during the war.

Everywhere you learn that all the men were at the front, all the best men were lost and all the women and children starved.

Here in Berlin I am ashamed of my size. I believe I am to-day quite the largest man in Germany, and I do not weigh 300 pounds.

I have learned thoroughly that which I never suspected at home and that which I did not come to learn. I was looking to Europe for the facts of finance. I found physical facts which make the rising war budgets of England, France, and my own United States supremely ridiculous.

FRANCE'S OPPORTUNITY.

If France did her duty by God and humanity she would expand her population and insure the preservation of that civilization and art culture which she has represented for so many years. But France is ambitious only for defense, for her own quiet ease and the pursuit of ways of pleasure, leisure, and art. The bulwark of a nation's defense is motherhood. There is no countertruth to that which declares: "If strong be the arms of the mother, the son shall make laws for the people."

WHAT MIGHT BE.

If France had ambition, energy, and family expansion, she could seize the present opportunity in Germany's weakened condition to absorb the industries of the Rhine and become what Germany has been—the industrial center of Europe. And she would have in addition what the German with his gutteral "g" and the Anglo-Saxon with his "th" can never have—the sound, the figure, the color, and the form of art as it is in beauty of all the divine creation.

France was fed by England, the United States, and by her own fertile fields, while Germany from her lands could raise only 50 per cent of her food. The people of England and France were neither shell shocked nor starved in comparison with Germany.

MILITARISM DEAD IN BODY AND SOUL.

Writing from Interlaken in September, 1918, after I had viewed the prison-exchange movements at Berne, and from Switzerland had studied the food conditions of Germany, I declared: "When the returns come in after peace it will be found that Germany's great loss and the basis of her defeat has not been money, but losses in her man power."

Many English, as well as American, observers have been of late looking over Germany, and they agree that militarism is dead in Germany for at least one or two generations. It is dead in the spirit of the people and dead in the man power.

BURYING MILITARISM.

There are two points in German history that emphasize the death of war in Germany. They are the funeral of the Kaiserin, which has just taken place, and the Kopp "putsch" of a year ago.

In March, 1920, more than 5,000 troops were sent into Berlin by Ludendorff for the purpose of reestablishing the old régime. The national Government quickly and quietly went out. But never was a Chinese boycott more effective than that of the Berliners against the military party. Everybody went on strike, officials, clerks, and office boys. Nobody would go to work. Nobody would recognize the troops. Nobody would do anything. Not a shot was fired. In a few days the troops melted away.

MORE POLICE AND LESS ARMY.

The German people may have a monarchy, but never again militarism. There is no danger from the more than 100,000 police or the 100,000 men in the Reichswehr or national army now allowed by the Allies for Germany.

The Germans complain that even this national army is expensive, as it has to be regularly employed, conscription not being allowed by the Versailles treaty.

The funeral of the Kaiserin at Potsdam offered the first opportunity for a military parade since the war. Three hundred German officers, in full uniform, were in line. Everybody was there; all the old and once popular idols of the people, Hindenburg, Falkenhayn, Ludendorff, and the rest. The people were willing to look at them, but had no interest in them as military men. It was more like a funeral of the military party. It was emphasis of what was made clear in the strike against Ludendorff and his troops a year ago—that the people were through with militarism.

AMERICAN MILITARISM.

The people who will regret the passing of militarism from the soil of Germany are the wives of the American Army officers who are already scheming to hold their positions here as long as possible. Officers' wives in Germany can pay three servants from the gold they get from America, while in the States they may be able to have none. There is a reversal of that situation here in the German families. The socialist government put a tax on servants, increasing it for the third and fourth servant to the extent that the tax became more than their wage. The result was to turn servants into the street.

The Germans are making many experiments and many mistakes in government, but their sentiment is now akin to that of the Irish who would rather govern themselves badly than be well governed by others.

GERMANS DRINK LESS.

The Germans are not drinking champagne as the French report. The Germans are drinking less and not more. The statistics of the French are compiled from the tax labels. The champagne in the country had to be called up and labeled for tax, but the label does not altogether mean consumption.

Champagne, as we understand it, is very rare. Even at the best hotels German champagne that sells for a third of the French is what one finds on the bill of fare. A glass of beer now costs 3 marks, but the consumption here has declined enormously. As the Washington darkey said, "It ain't got no authority whatsoever." The Government, under its food control, will not give up the grains to put the food value into beer.

Germany is still underdrinking as well as underfeeding, although many people declare that the German budget could be balanced with a proper beer tax. Not only has the consumption of alcohol declined enormously, but coffee of good quality is not to be had. The Germans say nobody can pay for "schnapps" now.

It is not inviting to the German to pay 250 marks for a bottle of French champagne. It even frightens an American until he figures that it is under $4.

There are some restaurants with French champagnes, but the Government does not encourage the importation of luxuries of any kind. Even lobsters have to be smuggled in from Holland in the bottom of vegetable baskets.

RICH AMERICA.

It is good to come into Germany if only to feel rich. "As rich as an American" now has ten times its former force. Many things, even in Berlin, cost about one-tenth the price in the United States.

I called upon an old friend of many years' standing and he greeted me with surprise. He was rich and well to do in every way and therefore could smile, as on surprise he exclaimed: "Don't you know we are at war? I expected you later, but not this year."

I questioned him by the hour and found him bitter against the French; but, like all other Germans, not bitter against the Americans. They seemed to take pride in the fact that neither the French nor the English could win the war. He said:

"America won the war. The French have robbed us for the last 400 hundred years and are now to tax us. Alsace-Lorraine and Belgium were formerly ours. Now they are sending people out of Alsace and Lorraine, some at five hours' notice without their property. Of late they are doing better and paying something for the property they confiscate. One hundred and twenty thousand people have been sent out of Alsace and Lorraine.

RESENTING THE TAX.

"The French gave millions to Russia, so that she might begin the war, and now Russian interest is paid by the French Government. France pays everybody and expects us to pay her. It is too much.

"The French have 850,000 soldiers. Why do they keep all these soldiers and ask us to pay for them?

"France sold German coal back to us cheaper than we could buy it from the German mines. We have still no wheat bread. The enemy starved us out, and you Americans won the war for the French. They cut off our food, and our children suffered. They had no milk, and the cows were killed for food. Our bread is now better, although still expanded by the use of beans. We make beans into bread as well as into coffee.

THE REAL TAX.

"In the district around my chateau we had 1,300 inhabitants, and from them sent 300 men to the war. That meant everybody between 18 and 50. We lost 80 men."

I asked one of the richest men in Frankfort concerning present and past conditions. He said:

"There has been tremendous improvement in the past year and a half. Nobody knows or ever will know what we suffered. They had us surrounded. Even my wife and I were starved. I lost 20 pounds in weight. There was, of course, food to be had, but people in our position could not afford to buy food. We must stand by the people."

THE LESSON OF THE COW AND THE ROSE.

On this year's trip to Europe my first landing for a night's sleep was at the island of Guernsey to inspect the beautiful lines of highly bred cattle which have become so important in American dairy farming. We American farmers understand something of what has been done in developing the dairy cow through many generations from the cattle of the plains and the hills, how milk veins and udders have been expanded, horns have been shortened, and types of head and haunch symmetrically changed, all by careful development in breeding. North Easton, Cohasset, and Hardwick, in Massachusetts, and Waterloo, in Iowa, stand for something in the land of Guernsey illustrative of the progress of man with animal life put into his hands.

As I walked here through the Tiergarten and Unter den Linden and noted the pinched, strained, shocked, and scarred faces, I could not but reflect upon the problem of what a prolonged modern war might do for humanity. If the dairy cattle of the world should be destroyed, it would take many generations again to breed by selection from the beef cattle of the plains the motherly milch cow.

If the world were a cultivated garden of roses and men went to war and forgot the rosebushes for a few years, the garden would revert wholly to the wild rose and the brier. In a few years could be lost the fruit of a hundred years' development in hybrid crossings, graftings, and sports, for the base of the rose is in the wild brier. Gardeners must still take the root from the forest to properly develop the sport.

THE SPORTS OF HUMANITY.

Many years ago I heard President Eliot say in that wonderful clearness of speech which so markedly characterizes him: "The benefit to the race of the common school is that it saves the sports of humanity—the remarkable child of an otherwise not remarkable family."

Had Germany at this time suffered a Thirty Years' War, there would be nothing left to tell the tale. The women and children that might have been left would have been gibbering idiots, with no groundwork on which German "kultur" could have ever again been brought forth. But if all the children had been set aside and allowed to grow up in ignorance, how many generations or hundreds of years would it have taken to have developed a distinctive type in the human family upon that stock with any ability to hold place in the modern world of intelligence.

The lesson of the Guernsey cow and the garden rose was borne in upon me as I looked at the wrecks in this shell-shocked, starved, and deservedly beaten nation. The Germany of old, that gave its literature, art, and music to the world, was swallowed up in the scientific and physical development that grew a war machine that had its inevitable fruitage in self-destruction.

The military root is still in Germany, as it is still in human nature, but not from that root will come the sports of humanity to grow something higher and nobler, the breadth and beauty of which must for years remain unread in the scroll of a future divine providing.

We can here only note the danger that the pride of militarism may be transferred to the United States, now planning war budgets by the billion, when a few billion in credits or cash could so mightily assist in the restoration of France and a solution of the peace problems of Europe.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, within the time allotted to me I shall address myself, not alone to the resolution, the passage of which by Congress and with the approval of which by the President would have the effect of ending the war with the Germans, but also to certain cognate questions which I regard as of equal if not of paramount concern to the Government and its people.

In November last, after nearly eight years of Democratic rule, the American electorate, according to the forms of an ordered and free government, decided by a strongly preponderating majority that Democratic rule should end and as a corollary that the Republican Party should again be restored to power, thereby investing the latter party with plenary authority as to all matters of national legislation and Federal administration.

Coupled with that authority were certain instructions, binding in character, delivered with great emphasis, for it was the voice of millions of men and women, recording their sentiments at the polls, who, by an overwhelming majority, proclaimed Warren G. Harding as President of the United States.

What were those instructions? One was that the covenant of the league should be cast aside, thrown into the discards. That has been done; but I may add that, as one of 435 Members of Congress, I shall, with not a little degree of anxiety, observe, as well as I may from this great distance, "every little movement" of the extra "full crew" men who, by our President, have been appointed as American representatives on the reparation and other like European war commissions. We wish for these gentlemen Godspeed, which term comprehends a safe and especially an early return to this country.

Another instruction was to the effect that peace with Germany should be restored. As it is now, the nations that were associated with us in the war have concluded treaties of peace; but we, in theory of the law but not in point of fact, are at war with Germany. This ambiguous condition ought to be changed. The situation is as anomalous and absurd as it is expensive, inconvenient, and unjust to the American people.

By the enactment into law of the measure before us, the majority party will have fulfilled its promise as regards the establishment of peace.

Mr. Speaker, while we are on the subject of foreign affairs, and particularly of the war, it is pertinent for me to observe that the foreign Governments that stand debtor to us to the extent of $10,000,000,000 are not manifesting a very great amount of concern—in fact, I presume no concern—as regards the discharge of the great obligations they are under—in fact, they have not even paid the interest on the debt. The money advanced to such Governments came from the pockets of our people as the proceeds of Liberty bonds and Victory notes. The people who bought the bonds are borne down under a very heavy burden of annual interest, necessary for us to pay on that debt. Consequently it seems to me as entirely just that our Government should immediately take steps to enforce the collection of these vast loans, now standing as mere open accounts, but nevertheless obligations of the most solemn character, on the books of the Treasurer of the United States. As germane to this subject, may I direct your attention to the proposition that the Government should by a refunding arrangement or other method, restore the par value of the bonds? Assurance was made by those, especially the four-minute men, who harangued the people to buy the bonds that they were good, but we know very well that they are now selling far below par.

One cause of the constantly falling price of Government bonds is due to the action of the international bankers who for certain commissions are flooding this country with foreign securities. Only the other day an issue of $100,000,000 of French bonds was dumped on the New York market at an interest yield of 8 per cent. I am told that the agents of six other nations have been, and perhaps are now, in New York negotiating for the flotation of further great issues. Our Government should take cognizance of the situation and maintain the position that no foreign bonds shall be sold in this country at a rate of interest higher than 6 per cent—I doubt if they should be allowed sale at all—in order to prevent our people from gambling in securities of very questionable value, and to protect the integrity of the bonds of our own Government, and of other domestic securities as well.

To what extent foreign nations may feel grateful for American assistance I do not know. That we have donated vast sums—probably three billions—to their charities and have made large private loans in addition to the Government loans I do know; and I therefore feel that it is now high time for foreign peoples to go to work and no longer to consider America as being solely an almshouse or one vast eleemosynary institution, operated for their exclusive benefit. We have obligations to our own people; charity must begin at home. The first duty of a nation, no less than that of the father of the family, is to provide for its own children. That we should do, and that we will do, in view of the fact that vast numbers of our most deserving workingmen are without employment and fundamental business enterprises—agriculture, commerce, manufacture, mining, and seafaring, all—in America are now almost stagnant.

It may take the world 50 years to recover from the ravages of the war. In the meanwhile the most rigid economy in government, State and Nation, also in private life, should be practiced. We Republicans promised the people to relieve them of heavy taxation. Will we do it? We must admit that we have a difficult task to perform and we have made slow progress. We have not, so far as my knowledge goes, abolished a single board or bureau or commission. We have, I believe, added some new ones—for example, the one regulating the packers.

Over in the Senate one or two Members are agitating the passage of a bill to regulate coal, and incidentally to provide some more good jobs. Such regulation would undoubtedly add to the cost of the article.

Before the war an unfailing supply of cheap coal flowed steadily from the mines to the consumers' bins; but with war regulation all has been changed. Thus far this year the mines have been run at low ebb because consumers have listened to the siren voice of demagogues—those who promise the passage of regulatory laws which will cheapen its price. Coal can be bought at the mines on a very close margin of profit. In some cases it is sold below cost of mining, but the real cost to the consumer lies in the transportation charge. Coal from my district, traveling over one of the three railroads to Norfolk and by boat from there to Boston and distributed from the latter port to the surrounding region, must bear a rate ranging around $7 per ton. The Interstate Commerce Commission regulates the rate. In the old days the railroad managers charged "all the traffic would bear," but they were too smart, too good business men to charge more than the traffic would bear.

Artificial laws and regulations, if persisted in, will ultimately destroy not alone the great coal industry but likewise great commercial and manufacturing enterprises and communities, such as exist in New England and elsewhere as well, in this United States. In the meanwhile I shall trust to the honor, wisdom, and ability of the Republican Party, constituted of its members in Congress—Senators and Representatives—and of the administration, headed by our excellent President, Warren G. Harding, to guide amid all vicissitudes the good old ship of state to a good and safe harbor, as was done by that party under the matchless and wonderful leadership of other men—stars of the first magnitude—Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, Harrison, McKinley, Roosevelt, and others—the great dynasty of Republican Presidents. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it had been my sincere wish and earnest expectation that the majority party in the Congress would forget the promise of a peace by resolution made by the successful candidate for the Presidency and not even attempt to make what was the most colossal blunder of a passion-swept political campaign the law of the land.

I am well aware of the fact that the only definite, specific, and clearly understandable declaration which the candidate for the Presidency made during that contest was the promise that there should be such an act just so soon as it could be passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President. Beyond this he stated that notwithstanding the fact that he had for years been a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate of the United States, which committee had been strenuously and successfully thwarting the Executive in his every effort to adjust international affairs, yet he, Mr. Harding, had absolutely no plan to offer nor any specific suggestion to make other than this, and he gave no satisfactory intimation as to the form of even that resolution.

So far as my knowledge extends, he has not yet offered a suggestion as to form, except that in his message, delivered to the House in person on April 12 last, he made it perfectly clear that it must not be such a resolution as he himself while a Member of the Senate had voted for and urged. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In that message he demonstrated quite clearly that there was a decided difference of opinion between Harding the candidate and Harding the President. In polite but nevertheless specific language he made it perfectly clear that Harding the President would brook no interference with the constitutional prerogative of the Executive. He told us that we might, with his approval, declare a state of peace, but that under no circumstances must Congress attempt to fix its terms and conditions. I quote here the understandable portions of what he said upon that point. The President said:

> To establish the state of technical peace without further delay, I should approve a declaratory resolution by Congress to that effect, with the qualifications essential to protect all our rights. Such a resolution should undertake to do no more than thus to declare the state of peace which all America craves. * * * In correcting the failure of the Executive, in negotiating the most important treaty in the history of the Nation, to recognize the constitutional powers of the Senate, we would go to the other extreme, equally objectionable, if Congress or the Senate should assume the function of the Executive.

I pause just here long enough to remark that this last sentence is not particularly clear as to its exact meaning. The fair inference, however, is that the President could not resist the opportunity to cast an impolite imputation upon his predecessor, and for this purpose wove into a state paper an expression which would not have been in very good taste even in a campaign speech.

At no time did President Wilson seek to thwart the Senate in the exercise of its constitutional prerogative of ratifying or rejecting the treaty of Versailles. He advocated with all the force of his powerful intellect its ratification without substantial change, as was his unquestionable right and as many believe was his supreme duty in keeping faith with the nations with whom he had negotiated it. He gave his spirit, his high mentality, his moral excellence, and actually depleted perhaps for all time his physical manhood, with devoted and unselfish vigor and vision that the work of his brain might live, but so profound a student of government as Woodrow Wilson never for a moment believed that he could, even had he desired, have destroyed the senatorial prerogative woven into the fabric of the Nation's fundamental law.

Just what view the President will take of this resolution if it reaches him in its present form, which if I understand the interpretation of sections 2 and 4, does unmistakably enter the domain of negotiation, indirectly it is true, but inevitably, remains to be seen.

It shall not at least escape the notice of history that as a Senator and as a candidate he advocated a resolution designed to interfere with the constitutional prerogatives of his predecessor for which as President he says he will not stand.

I have said that it had been my wish and expectation that the campaign promise would be forgotten, notwithstanding it was the only definite one given out touching our foreign policy. I know that neither a party nor an individual often obtains credit by breaking its or his word, but I think the majority party could well risk the opinion of men and history if it would forget that shameful promulgation and refrain from placing this inerasable stain upon the virtue of America's enterprise. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My hope was founded upon the knowledge which most men now possess of the reasons for that promise and for the action in the last Congress of passing the peace resolution and committing the majority party to it.

Those reasons were threefold: First, envy of and enmity toward the then Chief Executive, Mr. Wilson. Proceeding upon a predicate of passion and hate the majority were willing then to go to any length in the effort to humilitate and discredit him. How narrow and restricted was their vision time and history will demonstrate;

Second, their inability, moral and intellectual, to submit a substitute for his handiwork; and

Third, the determination to clinch for their party at the November elections the votes of all those elements in America who having but recently descended from foreign blood had their affections placed upon the aspirations of their kinsmen abroad rather than upon the interests and hopes of America.

In view of the character of the impulses which lay behind the action of a year ago, surely it would be an honorable thing to forget it so soon as history will permit. It ought to be effaced from the memories of men. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No necessity for this action has been suggested which can, it seems to me, possibly appeal to the heart and conscience of America. We have no precedent for it. Our foreign wars of the past have been settled by negotiated treaties, with honor to ourselves and justice to our foes.

Is it possible that the administration finds itself, after full consultation with what it regards the "best minds of America," helpless and hopeless? Has America under Republican leadership reached such a position of inanity and mental vacuosity as that it is unable to proceed along the lines of honorable diplomacy and negotiate a peace of justice and righteousness?

Must we leave the field made glorious by American valor and sanctified forever by the best blood of an unselfish Nation because the political leadership of the hour is unable to obtain a single promise or exact a single pledge giving at least some assurance that the things and principles for which our soldiers suffered and sacrificed and died are to be respected in the future? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It has been said in the course of this discussion that this resolution does not wipe out the record of Chateau-Thierry and Belleau Wood and the Argonne.

Indeed it does not. Fortunately the luster of those supreme efforts of American manhood can never be dimmed by partisan political ineptitude and imbecility. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But will some one tell me before the debate is ended what this resolution does toward making the principles for which men died there the law of the world?

I have thought, sir, that the President's Secretary of State has within the brief period of his service as such demonstrated the fine capacity and good judgment with which he has, I think, very generally been believed to be endowed. By following, without exception, so far as I have observed, the lines of policy laid down by the last administration and asserting our national faith with firmness and courage he has become easily the outstanding figure of the new administration.

It is hard to make me believe that Mr. Secretary Hughes is lacking in ability to deal with the big things of the world, even though he be handicapped by a Harvey and perhaps humiliated by a Sims. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, somehow, the majority in the Congress seem to think the diplomatic power of the administration futile and insufficient; and so inaneness is to be crowned with garlands, and America—our America—is to close the most thrilling chapters in the annals of man with a peace which should be known in history as "the peace of incapacity." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What the valor of our soldiers won on the fields of glory the timidity of our alleged statesmen will cast to the winds of the world, and we shall turn to face the future without a promise or a pledge, save only, I believe, sections 2 and 4 seek to place in escrow some $400,000,000 seized from resident Germans by the Alien Property Custodian and whatever of rights we have in the German ships that were interned at ports while we were neutral.

Mr. Speaker, there may be differences of opinion as to what our soldiers fought for. There ought not to be, God knows, yet there may be, but I venture to assert that nowhere in America will you find a soldier or a civilian who will have the temerity to declare that they fought for the property of resident aliens or for German ships, and those things, sir, are all that this resolution of peace reserves. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No, indeed; you will not have effaced by the passage of this resolution the glory of the Argonne and Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry; that is beyond your reach; but you will have quit without gripping by solemn treaty the achievements which American valor won.

You can not wipe from the face of France the blood stains of American soldiers, but you can, and apparently are determined to, take the fateful step which will go so far toward rendering vain the shedding of that precious blood.

Why should this resolution pass? Its proponents have adopted the most remarkable attitude upon it that within my memory has ever been adopted upon any great question. They lay it before us with a report which says nothing, and follow it up with arguments which but add to our ignorance of what the real reasons are, and then say the burden is upon us to show why it should not pass.

I am compelled to say, having listened to practically every word uttered in the debate by those who favor it—or perhaps I should say in justice to them by those who intend to vote for it—that the strongest reason yet given was given by a gentleman on my own side of the Chamber, Mr. HUDDLESTON, of Alabama, who said, in substance, that we should make peace with our enemies in this way in order that we may the more easily lend them money, so that they can buy from us. With all deference to my friend, whose character I respect and whose ability I admire, that reason is not sufficient to bring me to its support.

Besides this, what are the reasons? Trade reasons? Except as to dyestuffs, which we ourselves inhibit, trade with Germany and with the nations that were Austria-Hungary is limited only by the capacity of their people to buy. That capacity is not likely to be increased save as we ourselves increase it.

In order to bring the American troops home? If the President of the United States wishes to scuttle, he may order them home to-morrow and in all the world there is no power to say him nay. Germany would doubtless consent as it would relieve her of the burden of their support.

In order to exchange ambassadors? I am in no hurry about that. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know of no American interest in Germany which is not now being amply protected without an ambassador, and I have an all too vivid recollection of the last one which Germany had here to lie awake nights wishing for another to hurry to our shores. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have not heard of any German nationals in America suffering from injustice because no Von Bernstorff is lodged in the embassy building here to serve in the dual capacity of ambassador and spy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, but some say it must be done in order to drive the last nail into the coffin of the League of Nations. Are you so sure that such will be the result? In your heart of hearts are you—all of you—so sure that you wish it so?

You say the people of America spoke the final word of condemnation of that historic instrument at the November elections. Are you quite sure? I am not.

Oh, I know that Mr. Harding, lashed as with scorpions by certain eminent leaders of his party and a section of the press which was quite influential with an element of voters believed to be necessary to his election, declared in his Des Moines speech that he wanted to turn his back upon the covenant and destroy it, but are you sure he did it?

I know, too, that he so phrased other utterances both before and after that declaration of despair and compulsion as that 31 of the most eminent leaders of his party felt themselves able to issue a document destined to be historic, in which the people were reassured, and it was solemnly declared, that the surest guarantee of a league would be his election.

There is some one unique distinction to be found in the campaigns of every man who has been elected President of the United States—sometimes more than one.

In the case of Mr. Harding there are at least three.

First, he was elected by the largest majority ever given a candidate.

Second, he ran upon a platform which was absolutely colorless except when it was yellow. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, third and most unique of all, if his Des Moines utterance meant what league opponents claim for it, he used other utterances which enabled 31 of the most eminent leaders of political thought in America to issue an appeal to the American people in his behalf predicated upon the hypothesis that they might discredit his pledged word and plighted faith as expressed at Des Moines, and one of these eminent men is now the premier of his Cabinet, holding in his steady hands the matter of our foreign relations. I have forgotten whether the name of the ambassador to the Court of St. James was among the 31 immortals or not.

I think we shall have to wait for a little while even after this resolution becomes law before we shall be assured that what is probably the highest achievement ever wrought by finite men has perished utterly from the earth, so far as even America alone is concerned.

I always follow with great interest what my young friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has to say. He comes of good stock, and, as the late President Roosevelt once said to me in doing a requested favor for a grandson of the great Confederate cavalry leader, Gen. Bedford Forrest, "There ought to be something in heredity, surely." The gentleman from New York seems to be a thinker and has not demonstrated any particular backwardness in giving utterance to his thoughts. [Laughter.] I heard the gentleman from New York in the last Congress say that the people at the November election had declared against any surrender of the Nation's sovereignty, and he then proceeded to outline for us his plan of insuring future peace, which was, in substance, that he would have an agreement among nations whereby armaments and armies should be limited, no nation to have, as I remember it, more than 200,000 soldiers; and then he would have an impartial committee to see that the agreement was enforced throughout the world. I do not suppose it lay within the purview of his dreams that this committee would come wholly from America, and I could not but puzzle as to just how much of our sovereignty we would surrender to such a committee. That can be explained later, perchance.

On Saturday last the gentleman from New York told us that the American people repudiated the doctrine of sending American troops into foreign lands to decide boundary disputes. I am sure I have heard that before.

Abe Martin said the other day that Tobias Jordan had given up his position at the sawmill, but that the idea was not original with him. [Laughter.]

The favorite phrasing of Republican stump orators in the last campaign as they shed the effulgence of their intellectual rays upon the people was to the effect that America must not become involved in European troubles growing out of disputes over boundary lines in the Balkans. That was a mouth-filling phrase and sounded well; it touched the hearts of mothers and fathers everywhere, but serious men must examine it in the light of history. If we are to profit at all from the past, let us vision it as it has been, not as we would have had it, and let us realize that only by certain courses shall we be able to make the future what we would have it.

Since this Republic was created two general wars have convulsed Europe, wars in which practically all the nations of Europe became involved—the first in the early years of the nineteenth century, when two young men—Pitt in the cabinet and Bonaparte in the field—were struggling for European mastery. With the messages and warnings of Washington and Jefferson as to foreign entanglements fresh in our history and with all our determination as to aloofness we eventually, as the result of the frictions of that titanic struggle, went into the War of 1812 with England.

The second came with the recent holocaust. Surely now the most intense and inveterate enemy of Woodrow Wilson will not deny that no man in authority in the history of the world ever tried with finer zest and greater determination to keep world conditions such as that his nation might be spared the horrors of engaging in war than did he, but without avail. And what, sir, was the beginning of that struggle?

On a day in June, 1914, a Prince of the House of Hapsburg, the reigning family of Austria-Hungary, visits the capital of a little principality which Austria-Hungary had seized by force of arms from Serbia following a dispute over a boundary line in the Balkans. An assassin shot him to death. The flash from that pistol set the world on fire; all nations and peoples everywhere upon the globe were drawn into the vortex of that awful flame. Its fearful forked tongues ran from the centers of civilization into the remotest jungles of savagery, consuming with remorseless wrath the wealth, the substance, and the lives of men; 10,000,000 died; 10,000,000 others were maimed and almost lost to the world. Here in America we mustered from hillside and valley, from crowded city and quiet spaces of rural retreat, from mansion and cabin, 4,000,000 men. We sent 2,000,000 across the trackless waters to do battle in strange lands and amidst the babel of unfamiliar tongues; we left 100,000 to sleep there under the lilies of France, save only as at the request of those who loved them some are returned to rest here, their graves to be forever a mute compelling appeal that those who come after shall see to it that they made the supreme sacrifice not in vain. Why? All because of a dispute about a boundary line in the Balkans, when there was no League of Nations to which to submit the issue.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, is this resolution all that the majority has to offer to the mothers of America, as the result of their toils and tortures? Can the genius of the majority evolve no higher plan? Is this the ripened fruit of national endeavor? "Peace and we will hold pending settlement four hundred millions of money and the interned ships!" Is this the end?

Oh, you say no; but it is the power of your actions, not the force of your words, which will control. "It must not be again," exclaimed your President and mine over the 5,000 flag-draped caskets in New York. Ah, do you fancy that settles the problems of the future? Jefferson and Madison failed to prevent our becoming the victims of European quarrels; the prayers and patience of Lincoln were unavailing to prevent fratricidal strife; the gentle and patient McKinley strove in vain to avert war; the heroic and tenacious Wilson could not stay the holocaust. Do you for an instant believe that this resolution and the ipse dixit of Harding are sufficient to change the natures of men and fix the course of destiny? How absurd! We must act, not simply declare; we must arise to the evolutions of the world, the development of the mechanisms of men, the changes wrought in the social fabric, if we would even approach a guaranty that it will not be again, and must act in the light of history's lesson. It does not lie within the power of Mr. Harding or any other of the sons of men to still the troubled waters of the world by stretching forth his hands and, choking with emotion, say, "It must not be again"; nor can Congress quiet the rolling waves by any exclamation of "Peace, be still." The miracle of Galilee lies beyond our power; we must act; we must have a treaty or treaties; we must have behind it or them recognized power, power sufficient that all men know it must be respected.

The passage of this resolution throws away every moral and physical advantage which we now possess; it places us alone among nations, with all our vital interests exposed to the constant menace of a selfish and irritated world.

Surely we do not need to pass it in order to insure that we shall ourselves be just in negotiating with Germany and her allies. Is there anything in German history or any evidence in the manifested spirit of present-day Germany which encourages the belief that she will be more likely to make a just and righteous treaty after we have thrown every advantage away? Surely not. By passing it we are but depriving ourselves and our posterity of all the advantages accruing from a victory of arms honorably won by our bravest and our best and surrendering, perhaps for all time, the opportunity which has been ours and which still is ours to advance civilization and to calm at least in measurable degree the awful apprehensions of the mothers of men.

As an American Congressman I must be excused from aiding in such a denouement. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I shall indulge in no sarcasm. I shall contribute nothing of partisanship to the discussion. I shall not astonish, either by my learning or by my eloquence. I shall simply try, in the few minutes that I have, to tell this House why I think it is our duty to pass this resolution to-day.

Mr. Speaker, as it proverbially takes two to make a quarrel, it takes two to make a war. Similarly, it takes two to end a quarrel or a war. The passage of a peace resolution by the Congress of the United States is a domestic act. The action is unilateral and not bilateral. Therefore, in and of itself it can have no international force or validity. To this extent I am in accord with what I understand to be the views of my Democratic colleagues on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

But at this point I take sharp issue with them. The first and apparently the chief reason given in the views of the minority for opposing the resolution is, as alleged, because we can not "by an act of Congress enter into contracts with another Government," this being "an invasion of the treaty-making power." A treaty is undoubtedly a contract between two or more States. So if the proposed resolution constituted an offer to a contract, the point of the minority would perhaps be well taken. Apparently the minority has fallen into a fallacy, because it assumes that since this resolution contemplates bilateral action on the one hand by the United States and on the other hand by Germany, therefore a contract—or a treaty—is in some way involved. But because both countries must act before a mutually binding peace shall result, the action does not become contractual on the part of either. Suppose both nations simultaneously and independently declared the status of war to be ended; that could not be a contract, and yet the status of peace would be complete. A lapse of time between the two declarations does not alter the situation. The Porter resolution is neither an offer to a contract nor an acceptance of an offer to a contract. Hence, there is no treaty in contemplation and no violation of the Constitution.

It is instructive in this connection to remember that when we passed a somewhat similar resolution a year ago, the Democrats of the House made a great to-do about its constitutionality and, indeed, rested their case upon that point.

But President Wilson, in vetoing the resolution, calmly ignored the Democratic contention. He knew it was untenable. There is even less opportunity for the argument to be plausibly urged against the measure now before the House.

As I have said, action by Germany as well as by the United States is necessary before a status of peace between the two nations can be a fact. It is the view of some students of the subject that Germany has already taken her requisite action, in that by ratifying the Versailles treaty she said in effect that so far as she was concerned the World War was ended—ended even as against belligerents who, like the United States, might not choose to ratify the treaty—at the moment when the treaty by its terms became fully effective. Possibly this view is sound. At all events it is so held by eminent authority, and I for one do not feel willing to dismiss it as unsound. If it is sound, of course the enacting of the pending resolution unquestionably ends the war.

But let us assume for the sake of argument that it is not sound. Let us assume that Germany has yet to do her part in reestablishing peace with the United States. It by no means follows, as charged by the minority, that the passage of this peace resolution is useless. Even on this theory it is the first necessary step toward a peace status. Affirmative action by Germany on this theory must be taken thereafter. It thus becomes at once necessary to inquire whether Germany desires the restoration of technical peace. In an effort to give an accurate answer to this question I have for the last six months been making constant inquiries of diplomats, business men, and public officials, many of whom have themselves recently been in Germany. I have never yet found a man—American or European—who does not strongly believe that Germany will instantly take the step necessary for the restoration of technical peace, if, indeed, it has not already done so. Everyone has agreed that this is true; and while action of the future can not be stated as a present fact, I strongly believe that the United States is justified in acting upon the theory that Germany only waits the opportunity to bring about the ending of the war by any act within her power.

But admitting all this—and I think most thoughtful observers of both parties do admit all this—what advantages will come to the United States as a result of the restoration of technical peace that she does not now enjoy? My Democratic colleagues are prone—and the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee] is no exception—to minimize the usefulness of the restoration of peace by joint action of the United States and Germany. They call attention, for example, to the fact—and it is a fact—that our exports to Germany are of substantially the same volume as in the years prior to 1914. They cite other similar facts tending to prove their point.

So we are confronted, and I think we are in duty bound to meet the challenge—so we are confronted by the question, What is really to be gained by the United States by the resumption of a peace status? I do not agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that the restoration of diplomatic relations is of small account or even undesirable. I think the resumption of those relations is of great importance. It represents the established and the historic way by which two nations engage in intercourse with each other. Of course—I am glad to assert it, glad to admit it, or whatever you like—the first tangible result will be that the United States will send forth to Germany an ambassador and his diplomatic assistants and various consuls general, consuls, and other subordinates. When our consular offices in the Central Powers were closed just before we entered the war there were 73 representatives of the United States in those offices in Germany and 32 in Austria-Hungary. Thus more than 100 Americans, working for American interests, were in the two countries of Germany and Austria-Hungary in 1917. Since that time and up to this moment we have had no formal diplomatic or consular representation in either country. Of course, we have had commissioners in Berlin, Vienna, and Budapest, and these commissioners have had a few assistants, some of them holding a consular status and others holding a diplomatic status. But the relationship between these officers and the country in which they are located is purely informal and unofficial. Useful as they have been, the situation is a most unsatisfactory one and falls far short of bringing to the United States the advantages which lie open to us. For purposes of comparison it should be remembered that every one of the principal allied powers is represented in the Central Power countries by a completely organized staff of diplomatic and consular representatives.

For the past four years the interests of the United States in Germany have been handled by Spanish diplomats and consuls. I have no doubt they have done their work well and faithfully. But their first duty is to their own country. The interests of the United States are necessarily secondary. I believe that the time has long since come when American citizens should represent the United States of America in Germany, Austria, and Hungary. Let me illustrate by one small incident one of the results which flow from the present situation. Hamburg is of course one of the great ports of Europe and of the world. Suppose an American in Hamburg desires to ship certain goods on an American vessel from Hamburg to some other port. He must have his invoice certified by a consular officer.

Naturally, he would go to the American consul. But there is no recognized American consul in Hamburg. Therefore he must go to the Spanish consul, certify to his invoice, and pay a fee of $2.50. The fee thus received is retained by the Spanish consul and is lost for all time to the Treasury of the United States. A returning consular officer has recently told me that at the port of Hamburg alone 25,000 invoices were certified by the Spanish consul in the last year. This means a tidy little revenue of $62,500 lost to the United States in one port and on a single item of business. Probably the total fees thus lost per year, with the present volume of trade, would amount to at least half a million dollars.

But after all, in spite of the inconvenience to the American shipper, and in spite of the revenues lost to the United States, the intervention of the Spanish consul makes feasible the transaction of export business, though in a somewhat abnormal way. In other respects, however, this subterfuge can not be utilized at all. Many Federal laws and many State laws require that a document executed abroad must be executed before an American consul. It has been held that a Spanish consul acting as American consul does not comply with the requirements of these laws. Thus such instruments as deeds, powers of attorney, mortgages, and many other documents affecting the transfer of rights or property as well as other business transactions can not be attested in Germany at all. The inconvenience to the business world is instantly apparent.

Congress has taken cognizance of this situation in at least two instances. Section 5 of public law 366, approved March 3 last, provides:

> That all applications for patent filed since August 1, 1914, in which the oath was executed before or authenticated by a consular officer, or other representative qualified to administer oaths, of a Government acting in the interest of the Government of the United States, shall have the same force and effect as if said oath had been executed by the applicant before a consular officer of the United States.

This seems to care for the situation as far as patents are concerned, by allowing the Spanish officer to act. A similar situation has developed in connection with the execution of pension claims. On May 16 last the House of Representatives passed the Knutson bill, similar in purport to the patent section just quoted, to empower the Spanish consul to act in pension cases. But there are many classes of transactions as to which Congress has not acted and perhaps could not effectively act. We are trading with Germany—trading in considerable volume—and yet there continues, without warrant or reason, the small vexations for which the excuse long ago disappeared.

There are many other considerations, some of them very momentous, which unite to urge upon Congress the importance of restoring technical peace. Central Europe for a generation will be a battle ground of trade. Our sister nations are laying their plans with consummate care for the acquisition of trade advantages. We have scarcely begun. We can scarcely begin while our diplomatic and commercial interests are theoretically and to some extent practically in the hands of Spain. I want to see a great ambassador sent forth from the United States to Berlin, surrounded by a competent force of men trained in diplomacy and business. Not until this moment comes will the United States leave the starting post in the race for trade. The opportunity before us may be measured by the volume of trade of the present moment, which has come to us almost without the asking. If a carefully nurtured trade with the Central Powers were developed, a very large fraction of the export problems of the United States would disappear.

There is one quaint suggestion of the minority which, in conclusion, I desire to notice briefly. It is suggested that the passing of a peace resolution in some way constitutes a separate peace and involves a degree of moral turpitude because of the alleged desertion of our allies. Of course, the fact is that we are now engaged in a separate war, and that the objective which we seek is to rejoin our allies in that peace status which they have already enjoyed for nearly two years. Some of the principal statesmen of Great Britain and France have in public addresses recognized, and even approved, the precise course which we are now following. Certainly since April 21, when Secretary of State Hughes replied so explicitly to the German request that the United States mediate in the matter of reparations, I think there can not be a shadow of doubt either in Germany or elsewhere in Europe that the United States is loyal to her war associates and to her international obligations. Under the circumstances criticism on this ground seems captious, if not absurd.

The country is justly tired of a war status. Not a single argument can be advanced against the propriety of ending the war status. It is a solemn duty and obligation upon the Congress of the United States to do its part toward bringing about the restoration of peace. The resolution before the House does this briefly, simply, and adequately. It is difficult for me to understand how any patriotic American can bring himself to vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD].

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I have no set speech and nothing prepared, but I do not want the vote to occur on this joint resolution without availing myself of the opportunity to briefly suggest some of the reasons influencing me to vote for it—reasons which have impelled me to urge and advocate it from the very first.

I want to say I regretted very much—I felt a keen feeling of personal disappointment—when I discovered, first in the Foreign Affairs Committee and then again on the floor of the House on Saturday and to-day, that my friends on the other side of the aisle have permitted partisanship to enter into this question which concerns the international relations and the welfare of our country. It is in great contrast to the nonpartisan support the Republicans unitedly gave to a Democratic President in time of war. It is in great contrast to the united support which I recall a Republican majority, when I was a Member of the Fifty-fourth Congress during Cleveland's term, gave to a Democratic President in international affairs in time of peace. When Cleveland's Venezuelan message was read to a Republican House in that Congress, party lines entirely disappeared. We unitedly supported a Democratic President in making war. Why will you not equally support a Republican President in making peace? I heard the gentleman from Virginia complaining, and I think other Democrats were heard to complain, because, as they pretended, partisanship had entered into the discussion of this resolution by the Republican members of the Foreign Affairs Committee in that they framed the resolution without any consultation with the Democratic members. Why, Mr. Speaker, it was the very evident partisanship of the Democrats that we attempted to avoid. In their attitude on this resolution they have justified our fears. It was well known, and it was demonstrated on Saturday and again to-day, that they, or most of them and their leaders, had announced that they were against the resolution.

In an effort to carefully perfect the phraseology of the resolution, how was it possible to include in conferences to that end those who were against the very purpose? The resolution includes two propositions. Intense partisanship has blindly led the Democratic leaders in this House to oppose both of them. In international affairs this is to be deplored.

The first proposition is, Shall Congress adopt a resolution to declare peace? The Democrats were against that. The second proposition is, Shall we add to that resolution a paragraph that will retain the status quo as to American rights? And they were against that. And yet they talk about partisanship! When we were in favor of the resolution to declare peace, when we were in favor of adding to that resolution a proper reservation to protect American rights, the only remaining thing was to carefully phrase the resolution to carry out that intent. In the phrasing of such a resolution we could not be aided by calling into consultation men who were against the prime purpose of the resolution itself. We could not make progress by calling into consultation men who were against the first section, a declaration of peace by resolution of Congress, and who were also against the second section, to protect American rights by reservations maintaining the status quo. The Republican members who were in consultation spent days in perfecting the resolution, exercising great care, and mayhap excessive caution, in framing a resolution international in scope and one that would avoid encroachment upon the constitutional rights of the President.

This much we believe we have accomplished. The status quo is maintained, entirely avoiding any chance expressions of new affirmative legislation. Peace is declared without any encroachment upon Executive prerogative. The original resolution that was introduced contained affirmative expressions, expressions that might be construed as new affirmative legislation, but when you read the resolution as finally reported to the House of Representatives you will find that every word of the reservations is carefully limited to retain only the status quo. Partisanship should not have entered into that.

I for one have been in accord with the suggestion that we should not repeal the resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war. I do not entertain the fears expressed by some that a repeal of that resolution might be construed as a repudiation of the war. I do not in that regard fully share the fears of my esteemed friend, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee. If the original war resolution had been a declaration of war no possible misconception could result from its repeal. But the trouble is—and to this extent I am in accord with the concern expressed in the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee, a report to which as a member of that committee I have willingly lent my adherence—that the war resolution was not a resolution declaring war against Germany. It was a resolution that declared that a state of war existed, thrust upon us by the Imperial German Government. I for one, if it can be avoided, would not wipe from our statute books that statement of a historical fact.

But the reason I prefer the form of the House resolution is because it has been declared in this House that under the Constitution of the United States of America Congress has not the power to declare a state of peace as it has the power to declare a state of war. When that challenge is made I for one want to have the challenge met, and I want, when this resolution is enacted into law, it to be a resolution which announces the fact for all future time that Congress has the power to declare peace as well as the power to declare war. If there has been no precedent in the past, I want that precedent established now, and I do hope that my friends in the Senate who believe that Congress has the power to declare peace will show themselves willing to surrender the form of the Senate resolution which implies that Congress has not that power. It is that implication to which I am opposed. Let us meet the issue squarely. Let us write on the statute books a resolution that for all future time will stand as a precedent declaratory of the proposition that the Representatives of the people have the power under the Constitution not only to declare that a state of war does exist, but also to declare the corollary that a state of war does not exist.

The form of the Senate resolution, and that I fear is the reason for it, is a concession to the argument that Congress did not have the power to declare peace, and it therefore invokes the power of Congress to repeal any act that it has passed. Of course, Congress has the power to repeal any act that it has passed, but when this resolution becomes a law I hope it will be in a form that will say unequivocally and without subterfuge that Congress has the power to declare peace. Now, that the issue is raised we ought not to set a precedent, even by implication, that any President of the United States, although he has not the power to declare war, nevertheless has the sole power to declare peace. Let us assert otherwise in a form that will say it without qualification or contrary inference that a declaration of peace as well as of war rightfully rests with the Congress of the United States of America. [Applause.]

Now, I do not know that I have the time, but in connection with the suggestion about reservations, in connection with the suggestions regarding the effect of the reservations, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that many of those who have spoken here on this subject do not fully appreciate the force of unilateral agreements, how far they may extend, and what position it puts the country in when we have enacted a unilateral agreement and that enactment has been accepted by another country.

A unilateral agreement when accepted by another country becomes international, with all the binding force and effect of a treaty, but with the important qualification that it is binding only so long as both parties consent to adhere to it. Either party can withdraw from the arrangement at any time. It may be said to be in the nature of a revocable agreement, revocable at the pleasure of either party and without notice. Each party retains full freedom of action. This distinction is important in its bearing upon the question of invasion of the treaty-making powers of the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. An international contract from which this country might not withdraw without guilt of violation of contract is a treaty, and the negotiation and making of such a compact devolves upon the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. A unilateral agreement—a subject of domestic legislation and domestic repeal, although it may be of a nature to become, through acceptance of another power, of international scope—has never been considered an encroachment upon the Executive treaty-making power, probably because of the very fact that it remains within the domain of domestic legislation, subject at all times to repeal by the legislative body which enacted it. Such is the nature of provisions of tariff acts, which accord certain privileges to other nations adhering to the reciprocal clauses of such an agreement. No one ever pretended that any such provisions of a tariff act invaded the treaty-making power of the Executive. Let me quote from Fiore's International Law, Codified, section 920:

> A State which, by unilateral act, has assumed an international obligation is bound to carry out what it has voluntarily undertaken to do or not to do, so long as it does not revoke the act by which it bound itself.

Now, bearing in mind that under international law it will, until superseded by a treaty declaring otherwise, always be in the power of Congress to revoke the act embodied in this joint resolution, let us proceed with the argument. The moment this joint resolution is enacted into law Germany may signify her acceptance. It would be an acceptance if in reliance upon the resolution she sent to this country an ambassador and consuls, received our accredited ambassador, and permitted the entry of our consuls. The negotiation of a treaty would thus be greatly facilitated, but if we met with an obdurate Germany, it would always be open, until a ratified treaty decreed otherwise, to repeal the declaration of peace and the status quo ante would be restored.

Now, for a moment let us talk about the armistice and then we may recur to the status created by the unilateral agreement embodied in the peace resolution.

The same authority on international law from which I have already quoted refers to an armistice as follows:

> (Sec. 1775) An armistice may be concluded for a time either fixed or indeterminate. In the latter case it shall be fully operative until denounced by one of the belligerents.
>
> Nevertheless, even when the armistice shall have been concluded for an indeterminate period or shall have been extended indefinitely, it can never be assimilated to peace, nor can the state of war be considered as terminated.
> So long as peace is not concluded, hostilities may be renewed—it would not require either a new object of dispute, new formalities, or a new declaration of war; notification of the ending of the armistice would be sufficient to renew and continue the hostilities interrupted. It is necessary to bear these principles in mind, because both in the relations of public internal law and in those of international law, during the armistice, however long protracted, the law of war, not the law of peace, must be applied.

I have thus quoted at length because it has seemed to me that our present status—the status until this joint resolution has been enacted into law—is under the armistice, and not a status created merely by the cessation of hostilities, and therefore a status of something more than mere technical war.

If this armistice status should become merged into a treaty of peace, the state of war would be irrevocably at an end. It would require a new declaration of war or hostile acts of aggression to restore war conditions. It would be a new war. But if this armistice status becomes merged into a unilateral agreement as embodied in the resolution of peace, accepted by Germany in sending to us her accredited ambassador, if she failed to adhere to our demands, to the reservations forming a part of the resolution of peace, we would be well within our rights to repeal the peace resolution and thereby proceed with hostilities. It would not require a declaration of war. It would not be a new war. It would be returning to the status of war by our right to repeal our own unilateral agreement. What, then, becomes of all the arguments against this resolution that we are surrendering our power to enforce terms against Germany? We wish nothing but just terms, and that I for one believe Germany is ready and willing to accord to us. The ultimate arrangement will be facilitated by the resumption of diplomatic relations.

This joint resolution will be effective, and it has my hearty support because—

(a) It will create an immediate status of peace.

(b) Because acceptance by Germany involves every portion of the resolution, including the reservations.

(c) It paves the way to a treaty of amity and commerce.

(d) It makes possible the immediate resumption of diplomatic relations and thereby facilitates the negotiation of a treaty.

(e) It will immediately give to our commerce and to our citizens the benefit of consuls in Germany, in Austria, and in Hungary.

(f) The reservations are notice to the Allies as well as to Germany consistent with the attitude our State Department has taken in previous notes and with all of our rights as in said reservations set forth.

(g) It will pave the way to the prompt return of all of our soldier boys now with the armies of occupation by virtue of the armistice. When the armistice has been superseded by this peace resolution there will be no authority of law to keep our soldiers in Germany and they must be returned.

(h) It will prevent for all time the return of the Versailles treaty to the Senate with or without reservations. It being a peace treaty, when peace is declared by resolution the door will be forever closed to the resurrection of that abominable carcass. The reservations were only a partial index to the iniquities of the league.

The issue of the last campaign was fully comprehended by the voters. It was whether George Washington's immortal Farewell Address or Woodrow Wilson's un-American League of Nations should be thrown in the scrap heap. By more than 7,000,000 majority the voters decided against the Wilson league. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HICKS). The time of the gentleman has expired. The time remaining is 1 hour and 14 minutes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 26 minutes and the gentleman from Virginia 38 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, considerable time was taken up by unanimous-consent talk about the time the resolution was being considered fixing the time for the vote at 4.30 o'clock to-day. There is a general demand on both sides of the House for a little additional time. Therefore I ask that the time for a vote be fixed at 5 o'clock instead of 4.30 this afternoon, and that the additional time be equally divided between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that when the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] was given unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes, as I understand it, that was not to be taken out of the allotted time, and there was an understanding then that the time would be extended to 4.45 o'clock.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then this would be merely in keeping with that definite understanding.

Mr. GRIFFIN. So that it would be 30 minutes more.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is for the purpose of fixing the hour at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the order for taking the vote on the resolution be set at 5 o'clock instead of 4.30, and that the additional time be equally divided between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Virginia. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, there are some gentlemen on the Democratic side who want to speak in behalf of the resolution who have not been able to get time from the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PORTER. That is the purpose of this request.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think this additional time ought to be given to those on the Democratic side who want to speak in behalf of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman to incorporate that in his request.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand that is to be done.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That all of the additional time be so allotted?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, no. The gentleman had his time from Mr. FLOOD, did he not?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; I got it from the gentleman on the other side.

Mr. FLOOD. I am yielding time on that side to gentlemen who are opposed to the resolution.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman would not yield to me any time.

Mr. FLOOD. I am not yielding time to gentlemen on that side who are in favor of the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand that some additional time may be yielded to the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am compelled to insist that some arrangement be made to take care of gentlemen on the Democratic side who are in favor of the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think I can say that that arrangement has been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I reserve the right further to object, to get some information.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then, I object.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then, I understand the time runs to 4.45 o'clock.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; until 4.30.

Mr. PORTER. Will the gentleman from Virginia now yield some of his time?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I can not join in supporting a resolution that is presented in the name of restoring peace to the world. I desire to support all helpful legislation proposed, but this resolution, in my judgment, is more harmful than helpful.

It provides no remedy. It accomplishes nothing. It creates no new status. We have been at peace since November 11, 1918, and its barren declaration at this late hour is a childish absurdity. It makes no war settlement. It simply declares the fact that we are at peace. It will not take a single soldier out of an American uniform. Our war army has been demobilized for nearly two years. It renews no trade. During the last year our exports to Germany have been over $360,000,000, the greatest of our history. What we need is not a barren declaration of peace but actual peace settlements with the warring countries.

On principle this resolution is indefensible. It establishes no right in our favor. It forgives our transgressor without indemnity or admission of his wrong. It binds the United States and does not bind Germany. We can not legislate for Germany. As it takes two nations in combat to make war, so it takes two nations in agreement to make terms of peace. By this resolution we tie the hands of the United States and leave those of Germany free.

This resolution is a half-caste method of making peace that has no precedent among the practices of intelligent nations and is unworthy of our great Government. Under the Constitution the President, with the concurrence of the Senate, is given the sole power to make treaties and settle our international affairs. Every diplomat, every lawyer in the world, knows that no peace settlement can be made by the method here proposed. It can have no value except in the minds of those who are deceived by it. It is trifling with the great question of peace and world restoration.

What is the problem of the world? It is to restore stability, confidence, and security. There are a dozen ways of making peace, but there is only one end to be accomplished. That end is to restore security and stability to the warring countries. The resolution adds confusion and uncertainty and instability by emphasizing a separate peace, division among the Allies, and a seeming indifference of the United States to the instability and distress of Europe. In other words—words instead of action.

It is a continuation of the exasperating policy of confusion, doubt, and uncertainty that for 18 months has turned Europe and the world from hope to gloom. America needs to prove to the world that she is "faithful in peace to the immortal principles which guided her in war." America can not afford, after having made a glorious triumph in war, to make an inglorious settlement in peace.

Whatever reason has existed for attempting to make peace in this fashion has passed away. During the last Congress President Wilson and the Senate unfortunately failed to agree and that was urged as a justification of this method of attempting to make peace. No such inharmony now exists. They are the agencies created by the Constitution to make peace settlements. As there is no sufficient reason for their failure to function, there is no reason why this House should usurp their functions.

Let President Harding, with the aid of his able Secretary of State, as he has a right to do, negotiate a treaty without interference of the Senate. When the time comes, let the Senate perform its unquestioned authority by either ratifying, modifying, or rejecting the treaty so negotiated. Congressional action in advance is not only officious, but harmful as well as futile.

OUR POLICIES UNDEFINED.

Outside of routine matters, making a treaty of peace in settlement of our world problems involves but three fundamental questions: First, shall the United States enter a league or an association of nations for the purpose of preserving the peace of the world and preventing future wars; second, shall the United States participate with our allies in the postwar problems of enforcing the peace treaty and restoring Europe; and third, reparations to be enforced against Germany for the destruction of lives and property of people of the United States and our Government.

Our attitude on these questions is undetermined. While we have debated, hesitated, and delayed Europe waited on us, and for the lack of our helpful participation passed from a situation of political, financial, and moral hopefulness to one of dissension, depression, confusion, instability, and despair. The treaty of Versailles provided for the voice of America in the settlement of postwar problems. We finally rejected that treaty and have provided no substitute. The warring nations, including Germany and Austria, looked to us for participation, advice, moderation, for our harmonizing influence and for a bulwark of justice and stability in the restoration of Europe. The first need of Europe was not our money or our soldiers, but the aid of our moral prestige.

In his opening message to Congress, the President declared:

In the existing League of Nations * * * this Republic will have no part.

This definite statement seemed to eliminate the League of Nations from the question of settlement and made it no longer a source of confusion, delay, or impediment in making peace. Having so determined, the President did well to so declare. Proceeding with his message, the President declared in favor of an "association of nations" concerning which he said:

We yearn for this new instrument of justice.

Having added certainty to the situation by discarding the League of Nations, the President added more confusion and uncertainty by declaring for an association of nations.

There is no inherent difference in a League of Nations and an association of nations. The suggestion that we reject a League of Nations and create an association of nations assumes that names and forms are of more importance than substance. No effective association of nations for the preservation of peace will ever be established that does not contain the fundamentals of the League of Nations, regardless of whatever name it may be called. The fundamental idea of the League of Nations is conference and understanding between nations, arbitration, a world court of justice, disarmament, and cooperation to protect weak nations, and to prevent aggressive wars. The language of the instruments provided for these purposes may vary, but the fundamental purposes are the same. If it be the real purpose of the United States to participate with other nations in attempting to preserve the peace of the world and prevent wars, the only practical method of doing it is to cooperate in the existing League of Nations, composed of 48 nations, upon terms agreeable to the United States.

President Harding's frank recognition of the need and justice of an association, or League of Nations, after having given much thought to the subject, must be regarded as entirely commendable. Nevertheless, negotiating another league or association with those 48 nations and others is wholly impracticable.

Nobody supposes there are going to be two associations of nations. A declaration on the part of the United States that we propose to initiate an association of nations would in effect be a declaration of our purpose to destroy the existing league and establish another organization of unknown and doubtful value not wanted by any other nation and contrary to the desire of all allied countries. Such a declaration would weaken and render more difficult the work of the existing League of Nations, and add to the confusion and dismay of the world. Such a declaration carries nothing of helpfulness. It proposes a program of further delay, confusion, and uncertainty.

To-day we can go to the leaders of this House, to the leaders of the Senate, to the White House—we can go to the diplomats of every friendly nation, and nowhere can we find an answer to the question: Is America going to participate with the other nations in restoring stability or in preventing future wars?

This confusion and uncertainty as to our attitude should cease. If we will do nothing to assist in the restoration of Europe, it is better to so declare. Let us at least help the world by clearly defining our purposes.

Over seven months ago our President was elected to lead us in a prompt settlement of our peace problems. Each month since the world has waited to hear him define our policies as the spokesman of the world's greatest Nation. Yet two years and a half after the war the policy of America is undefined. If she has a policy of restoration, it is a secret unknown to all. We have passed through seven months of accumulating uncertainty and depression. In a less time our former President negotiated and completed a treaty acceptable to 48 nations, covering the most complicated situation ever involved in a treaty of peace, and presented it to the Senate for ratification.

EARLY SUCCESS OF PEACE NEGOTIATIONS.

The war inevitably left heavy burdens upon the world. The need of the world was the greatest that ever appealed to the consciences and intelligence of men. Yet, though infinitely difficult to secure, fundamentally the need of the world was simple. The need of mankind was to return to work in peace and security, secure in life and property, secure in the right to work, secure against militarism, secure in the faith that their governments would endure, and to be relieved of the obligation of longer bearing oppressive military burdens.

To accomplish these needs Europe looked first to America. During the war President Wilson had been the unquestioned spokesman of our country. America had contributed to the success of the war to a degree unexpected by any nation in the world. America had no motive of selfish aggrandizement in that war. Allies and enemies recognized the power, prestige, and the comparatively disinterested motives of our country. By common consent America was assigned an equally noble place in the making of peace.

On the 11th day of November three years ago the armistice was signed and peace was suddenly restored to the stricken world. We were flushed with victory, but faced a situation of doubt and apprehension. Three million and a half men were to be discharged from our military organizations and seek reemployment in civil life. Several millions more drawn to our war industries were soon to be in need of other work. Uncounted millions of dollars in our war industries suddenly became unprofitable investments. We were confronted with the necessity of making one of the greatest peace readjustments known in history. We hesitated and doubted the capacity of our country and the world to endure the strain. That uncertainty was reflected in every business establishment in the United States. In 90 days fears were allayed, business regained confidence, there was employment for all, there was demand for every man's product. In seven months, and without the distress of unemployment, we had discharged 3,000,000 men from the Army. Within 60 days after the armistice the whole world had taken heart and started to work with an unexpected confidence and hope.

Decisive leadership was creating confidence. Less than four weeks after the armistice was signed the President was on his way to France to take part in the peace negotiations for the readjustment and reconstruction of the world. Rapid progress was made in the negotiations. In less than 90 days a tentative draft of the treaty was drawn. The newspapers and the financial publications of practically every allied country carried optimistic accounts of the harmony that had prevailed and the progress that had been made. This confidence was reflected in the fact that practically the whole world was returning to work, there was a job for every man, there was a market for every product, and hope enlightened the gloom of the world. The prestige of America under the unquestioned leadership of our President was leading the world back to security, stability, and a just peace.

When this stage of the peace negotiations had been reached, President Wilson was compelled to return to the United States to give his attention to the measures that had been adopted by the Sixty-fifth Congress, which was then in its closing days.

WILSON AND POLITICAL SABOTAGE.

For two years Woodrow Wilson has been the storm center of comment, ranging from that wholesome criticism that is essential for a popular Government to the gross attacks of unreasoning bitterness. To-day, with the more certain knowledge of retrospection, we can better judge the merit of these criticisms and the motives and methods that inspired these violent attacks.

I have frequently deplored some characteristics of President Wilson. I have deplored his seeming indifference to diplomatic methods of accomplishing results. I have deplored his lack of friendly contact and cooperation with Congress. I am able to understand a degree of the animus with which his political opponents assail him. But I am utterly unable to understand why some men in responsible positions permit their course in public affairs to be perverted and their country and the world distressed by a distorted opposition to President Wilson. Even the President of the United States is only a personality that soon passes on into the story of the past. But the policies we adopt endure to bless or scourge our country. I can see how a man in bitter passion may be willing to destroy the house of his enemy, but I am unable to understand how, to accomplish such purpose, he is willing to burn down a city. It is an impossible condition in our affairs when opposition to one man's personality should pervert the great processes of a nation. As Clemenceau said of a similar situation in France:

What a misery to reduce to personal concern the immensity of the interests at stake.

Saturday a gentleman stated on this floor with vindictive zeal that President Wilson made a most "dismal, humiliating failure" to negotiate peace. The failure of the United States to join with our allies in an honorable peace and to give the prestige and power of the United States to the restoration of stability to the world has indeed been humiliating.

Whether or not that humiliation shall be charged to Woodrow Wilson or his political opponents is not a question that can be decided by citing election statistics. The people have frequently made mistakes by large majorities. On another day and time the world will pass final judgment upon the work of Woodrow Wilson. It will not base its judgment on the testimony of those who sought success in his failure. Some day, freed from political motives and misrepresentation and distortion, the world will seek the facts.

When the world finally seeks the truth as to the cause of our failure it will find one of the first chapters of the story in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1919. It will find that on that day Senator LODGE rose in the Senate and presented a resolution which declared:

> That it is the sense of the Senate that while it is their sincere desire that the nations of the world should unite to promote peace and general disarmament, the constitution of the League of Nations in the form now proposed to the peace conference should not be accepted by the United States.

Objection having been sustained, Senator LODGE continued:

> I merely wish to add, by way of explanation, the following:
> The undersigned Senators of the United States, Members and Members elect of the Sixty-sixth Congress, hereby declare that if they had had the opportunity they would have voted for the foregoing resolution.

This "round robin" was signed by 39 Senators and Senators-elect.

That was a remarkable resolution because it sought to deny the President his constitutional authority to negotiate treaties or to destroy his usefulness in so doing by interfering therewith. It is also remarkable for the lack of what it contains. It declared in favor of an association of nations to promote peace and general disarmament and that the League of Nations, "in the form now presented," should not be accepted. No statement was made of any specific objection to the "form" of the league. No helpful information was in fairness given the President as to what he should do to make the "form" of the league conform to their wishes. Pursuant to this resolution the President might have changed the "form" of the league every day in the year and still the proposers of the resolution could stand on their objection that the "form" should not be accepted. The resolution had all the earmarks of a destructive, obstructive effort without one word of helpfulness.

Prior to this time, after the return of the President to the United States, the Foreign Relations Committees of the Senate and House, at his invitation, had met President Wilson at the White House, where he presented to them the tentative draft of the league for their information and suggestion. Mr. LODGE was there and made no material suggestions to improve the treaty.

Nevertheless the President made other efforts to ascertain the best sentiment of the country as to what changes should be made in the League of Nations to make it more acceptable to the United States consistently with its fundamental purposes. The President received a number of valuable suggestions from Mr. Root, Mr. Taft, and Mr. Hughes, which were subsequently embodied in the League of Nations by the Allies before it was finally presented to the Senate of the United States.

This "round robin" was presented on the 4th day of March, the day before the President returned to Europe to resume his negotiations. The next day the newspapers of every country in the world threw a doubt upon the peace negotiations and declared the Senate would not stand behind the President in his negotiations in Paris.

Prior to the President's return from Europe the Commercial and Financial Chronicle in an editorial described the situation at the treaty table in these words:

> The peace conference is making progress. Not the least of the things it has accomplished is the peace that exists among its immediate numbers. President Wilson's pre-eminent part in obtaining this result is recognized on all hands in Europe. Private letters have reached us expressing surprise that this is not universally recognized here, and pressing the importance of the utmost support for him in view of the work that remains to be done.

But the necessity of supporting our President at the peace conference, even though of the utmost importance for the welfare of America and the world, did not appeal to embittered leaders. The destruction of Wilson became of more importance than the construction of the world.

The President returned to Paris. Negotiations were resumed. He took his place at the peace table in a different atmosphere. The spirit of concession to America had departed. Consider the position of the President and we will understand the reason for the change.

The President went to Europe as the exponent of high ideals, to work for a treaty of justice, for a treaty that would establish rights and give security to small nations. Part of the President's mission was to stand against oppressive settlements—in many instances, perhaps, to stay the hands of the victors of the war, to stand against selfish aggression.

When the President entered the council of peace he did not enter a contest with our enemies. He entered a friendly yet difficult contest with those with whom we had been associated in the war. Germany was defeated and at the mercy of the Allies. Germany had given abundant cause for revenge. If England, France, and Italy cherished revenge, the hour of their opportunity was at hand. If they coveted selfish aggrandizement at the expense of their enemies, then was the time to write it into the treaty.

Whether there should be a just treaty of healing influences depended upon the righteousness of our cause and the unity with which we supported the President as our representative at the peace table. The reactionaries and junkers of the allied countries had little patience with the idealism and restraints of Wilson. The war waged by many nations could not be settled by a peace dictated by one alone. At best, concessions must be made. The hope for a treaty of justice and security and that would bring the enduring peace for which we fought was that behind the President should stand united America. Seemingly winning the rest of the nations at the peace table, our President was deserted by his own country. With the weakening of Wilson at home came new demands for concessions. Finally, feeling that the Allies would not join in a treaty to which he could conscientiously subscribe his name, he ordered the George Washington returned from America for the purpose of abandoning the negotiations. Then the Allies came with new concessions; Wilson renewed the fight with all his energy, until for sheer lack of strength he was driven to his sick room. The peace negotiations were transferred to his bedside, and still he continued the battle for what he believed to be the cause of humanity.

While Wilson was making this fight in Paris, Mr. LODGE wired a meeting of Italian-Americans in Boston, declaring Fiume should be given to Italy—

> Not only for her own protection but as an eventual barrier against any future attempts of Germany to attack the rest of the world as she did in the recent war.

That telegram was published in Europe as additional evidence that the President was unsupported at home.

What were the facts about Fiume? Before Italy entered the war she made a treaty with England and France called the treaty of London, and in that treaty had promised that the port of Fiume should belong to the interior country. Wilson simply demanded the promise be kept. Clemenceau declared:

> The Fiume question has been agonizing. Italy promised Fiume to the Jugoslavs, but went back on her promise. France, England, and the United States have sought a solution.

This is only an illustration of the methods used to discredit and weaken the power of the President. The feeling such methods created in Europe is indicated from the fact that a newspaper in Paris openly declared: Why should Wilson "be allowed to impose his political conceptions upon us," when within a year his political opponents will be in the White House and in all probability will "denounce all his conceptions"?

Whenever in the peace negotiations Wilson stood against the selfish demands of any foreign country, allied or enemy, that fact was made the basis for appeal to the nationals of that country in the United States to oppose the President of our country. Political ends were better served by espousing foreign demands than sustaining the just stand of the President.

Many enemies of England and France in America used every means in their power to discredit Wilson at the peace table. He was bitterly denounced from one end of this country to the other because, it was claimed, he yielded too much to England, he yielded too much to France. In the bitterness and rashness of national hatreds they forgot that at best a victory of many allied countries could not end in a peace dictated by one. They forgot what was unquestionably the fact, that the more they weakened the arm of our President the more power they gave to England and France in writing the treaty. Those in this country who complain of England's power and France's power exerted at the peace table, to the extent that they weakened the arm of Wilson in those negotiations, are complaining at the results of their own work.

WILSON'S PROGRAM CONTRASTED WITH OPPONENTS.

Opposition to the peace treaty by those outstanding men who have been conscientiously opposed to entangling alliances must be regarded as commendable, but the opposition based on no conscientious principle of government, but shifting from day to day as political convenience dictated, is neither worthy of respect nor admiration.

The opponents of Woodrow Wilson to-day boast of their responsibility for his failure. Unquestionably they are entitled to that credit, whatever it may be. We can now contrast the postwar program Wilson proposed with the performance of those who boast of having destroyed that program. What was the postwar program of Wilson? What is that failure of which we hear boastings?

Within four weeks after the armistice President Wilson took up the negotiation of peace. In less than 90 days a tentative treaty had been drawn. That treaty involved the greatest complications of any treaty in the history of the human race. Within five months it was ready to present to Germany. Within seven months it was presented to the Senate of the United States, by whom it was finally rejected eight months later. In the meantime it was ratified by over 40 nations, including every belligerent country except our own. To-day it has been accepted by 48 nations, having more than 1,000,000,000 people and being three-fourths of the population of the whole earth. It has been more universally accepted than any other document of government ever written by human hands. Mankind will yet delay before they pronounce the authorship of that document a failure.

FEDERAL TAX PROGRAM.

More than two and a half years have elapsed since the armistice and yet the country is inflicted with war taxes devised during war time to meet war conditions. A part of the postwar program of President Wilson was to relieve the country of these inequitable and excessive taxes.

On the 20th day of May, 1919, more than two years ago, before Wilson returned to the United States from Europe, he transmitted a message to Congress in which he said:

I hope that the Congress will find it possible to undertake an early reconsideration of Federal taxes, in order to make our system of taxation more simple and easy of administration and the taxes themselves as little burdensome as they can be made and yet suffice to support the Government and meet all its obligations.

Further advising Congress as to the principles of taxation which should govern our postwar system of taxation, he declared:

We have found the main sources from which it must be drawn. I take it for granted that its mainstays will henceforth be the income tax, the excess-profits tax, and the estate tax.

Speaking further in reference to the reduction of taxes, President Wilson said:

Changes can be made to advantage both in the rates of tax and in the method of its collection. The excess-profits tax need not long be maintained at the rates which were necessary while the enormous expenses of the war had to be borne, but it should be made the basis for a permanent system which will reach undue profits without discouraging the enterprise and activity of our business men * * *.

Referring further to the "minor taxes" provided in the war-revenue measure "made necessary by the pressing necessities of the war," and which can not "find sufficient justification under the easier circumstances of peace and can now happily be got rid of," the President continued:

Among these, I hope you will agree, are the excises upon various manufactures and the taxes upon retail sales. They are unequal in the incidence on different industries and on different individuals. Their collection is difficult and expensive.

An adverse Congress was heedless of these practical recommendations for the relief and betterment of business following the war. Those inequitable and excessive taxes are still with us. So the Wilson plan in this respect failed and his political opponents are justly entitled to the credit of that defeat, whatever that may be.

ANTIPROFITEERING PROGRAM.

At the time the United States entered the war, we were practically without any Federal laws to punish or prevent profiteering. At the conclusion of the war and the passing of food control, the evils of profiteering became more manifest. Two years ago the President appeared before Congress and urged legislation to suppress profiteering. He called attention to the unconscionable profiteering inflicted upon the consuming public and its injustice and the inevitable underconsumption and injury to producers and consumers alike that would follow if effective restraints were not provided. An adverse Congress was heedless of the recommendations. Profiteering was permitted to continue. Prices soared until there was an underconsumption by the public, leading to the buyers' strike, which added to the instability of the world and further contributed to our present financial depression.

So the Wilson program as to antiprofiteering failed. His political enemies are entitled to the credit of its defeat, whatever it may be.

DISARMAMENT.

The treaty provided a means of arranging world disarmament. That program failed, and we are forced to continue maintaining military organization at the rate of over $700,000,000 per year.

SAVE OURSELVES BY SAVING EUROPE.

In August, 1919, nearly two years ago, our country in common with the rest of the world was prosperous. The world had not then lost confidence in the effort that was being made to restore and stabilize Europe. President Wilson then appeared before Congress and urged that if for no other reason than our own benefit we should cooperate in restoring and stabilizing Europe. He urged that if we did not participate in avoiding world disaster it would inevitably be communicated to the United States.

We must face the fact that unless we help Europe to get back to her normal life and production a chaos will ensue there which will inevitably be communicated to this country. We, and we almost alone, now hold the world steady. Upon our steadfastness and self-possession depend the affairs of nations everywhere.

Further referring to the part our country had taken in the war President Wilson said:

She saved Europe by her action in arms; she must now save it by her action in peace. In saving Europe she will save herself, as she did upon the battle fields of the war. The calmness and capacity with which she deals with the matters of the problems of peace will be the final test and proof of her place among the peoples of the world.

And, if only in our own interest, we must help the people overseas. Europe is our best customer. We must keep her going or thousands of our shops and scores of our mines must close. There is no such thing as letting her go to ruin without ourselves sharing in the disaster.

Looking back with a certainty of retrospection, we now see that for failure to participate in the restoration of Europe we have contributed to the misery and suffering of allied and enemy countries alike and have contributed to the demoralization of the business world in which our own financial and economic fabric is involved with the curtailment of our foreign market and the business depression of our country. Our banks have been in good financial condition. Our producing capacity is the greatest of our history, and yet our farmers are unable to sell their products for the cost of production.

Our ships are disappearing from the sea. Investments are stagnated, factories are closed, business failures have exceeded all previous records, and our unemployment is without parallel. An eventual decrease in prices and a slackening of business was an inevitable aftermath of the war. But the building construction and production needs of the world following the war were such that by strong, united leadership we would have been secure against immoderate depression for many years to come.

In 1919, the year following the war, we had an export trade of $7,920,000,000 and a balance in trade of over $4,000,000,000, the greatest in our history. Together we have seen the accumulating confusion and distress of the world and our diminishing trade and markets.

The constructive mind of President Wilson foresaw this impending disaster and in advance tried to rescue our country and the world. His program failed. His political enemies are entitled to the credit, whatever it may be.

THE EFFORT TO ESTABLISH WORLD PEACE.

President Wilson believed that our part in this war should not terminate until the great purpose of peace had been achieved. He strove that the warring nations together might make peace and that the Allies by solidarity and united action should restore Europe and enable her people to return to their peaceful pursuits in security.

More than that, the President knew history. He knew the awful blood, sacrifice, sorrow, and destruction that the trail of war has left in the world. He conceived that war is a cruel and barbaric way of settling the disputes of nations, for which peaceful methods should be substituted. He sought to write into the treaty a means for conference and agreement among nations. Provisions were made for arbitration, an international court of justice, and arrangements for disarmament.

The treaty as finally written included the most concrete effort ever made in the history of the human race to banish wars from the world. No one at the peace table ever expected that such a plan of world and permanent peace could be successful without the participation of the United States. America was regarded as the keystone in the arch of world peace. Without her the structure is incomplete and insecure.

President Harding at New York recently in the presence of thousands of flag-draped caskets of our soldier dead uttered this noble sentiment: "It must not be again." Wilson at the peace table and in America fought and gave his last ounce of strength and finally surrendered the future of his life attempting to write into the laws of mankind "It shall not be again." Such words and deeds may be futile, but America honors the words of the one; she will not condemn the deeds of the other.

One thing is certain. If there is a way to permanent world peace, it is not the old way to which we seem to be returning. The desire for permanent peace and security is as old as human aspirations. As long as those aspirations have existed the old way has failed. Those who would seek to gain world security must depart from the old way. However effective any plan of world peace may be it must meet the opposition and condemnation of those who instinctively rebel at the new.

The peace of the world, if ever attained, must be accomplished by those who have the imagination, the courage, and the will to depart from the beaten paths of history, misery, and woe.

We entered the war with the full might of America. In the hour of distress we stood with our associates when the fate of the world hung in the balance. Our soldiers marched with the Allies behind the same flags. They lay wounded on the battle fields together and pressed to each other's lips the last drop of water, and for each other sent home the last message. Their blood mingled together on the same sod and together they were buried in the fields of France. In the final hour of triumph we rejoiced together. In that hour our country was the most beloved by foreign peoples of any country in the annals of history. Since that hour of great achievement we have lost much. We have sacrificed the moral leadership of the world. Let us no longer delay the hour of recoupment. Let us return to the path we abandoned. Let us renew the hope of the world by playing our part, a manly part. Let us together join in the restoration of peace, security, and prosperity to our own country and the world.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is now more than a year ago since the House passed a resolution having precisely the same effect as the resolution that is now pending. It was not then and it is not now intended to be a treaty or an agreement between the United States and any other power. It has been said that it is a unilateral act. That is true. It is not intended to be anything but an act of the Government of the United States. It is not intended that it shall have any effect except within the jurisdiction of the American Government. A unilateral act; yes. All that is left of the war is a unilateral war. [Applause.] Germany is not at war with us. Germany has already made peace with all the world. The armistice of November 11, 1918, was the actual end of the war in everything but bare legal form, and the treaty ending Germany's war with all nations became the law of Germany and went into force there when it was ratified by that Government and three of the principal allied and associated powers.

When the armistice was signed, it was accepted on both sides as the actual end of the war. There was nothing temporary in the suspension of hostilities. We brought our armies home and demobilized them. That Germany also recognized the so-called armistice as the actual end of the war needs no proof, but let us refresh our recollection of the provisions of that agreement which left Germany unable to resume the fighting.

Article 4 of the terms of the armistice provides that Germany surrender 5,000 pieces of heavy and light artillery, 30,000 machine guns, and 2,000 airplanes. Articles 22 and 23 provide that she surrender 160 German submarines, 10 battleships, 6 battle cruisers, 8 light cruisers, and that Germany completely disarm all other surface warships and all vessels of the auxiliary fleet. Article 10 provides that Germany shall immediately repatriate all prisoners of war. Article 19 provides that Germany make financial reparation of damage done.

There was full justification for President Wilson's statement to Congress at the conclusion of his reading of the terms of the armistice at the joint session of the two Houses, when he said:

> The war thus comes to an end; for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it.

That this was in fact no true armistice but actually a complete surrender and abandonment of the war by Germany may be more fully realized if we consider the distinction between an armistice and a peace as set forth by Woolsey.

> But while an armistice is an interval in war and supposes a return to it, a peace is a return to a state of amity and intercourse, implying no intention to recommence hostilities. An armistice again leaves the questions of the war unsettled, but a peace implies in its terms that redress of wrongs has been obtained, or that the intention is renounced of seeking to obtain it. (Introd. to Int. Law, sec. 50.)

The so-called armistice does not present either of the characteristics thus described as essential to a real armistice, and it does possess both characteristics by which Dr. Woolsey distinguishes a peace from an armistice. It does not suppose a return to war, and it does imply in its terms a reparation for wrongs done. Rather it does not merely imply such redress; in article 19 it specifically provides for it. In signing these terms Germany made a complete surrender. It was universally recognized as the end of the war and was so characterized by President Wilson not only in his address to Congress, which I have just quoted, but also in his announcement to the country, in which he said:

> My fellow countrymen: The armistice was signed this morning; everything for which America fought has been accomplished.

Yet in spite of the actual ending of the war there remained, and so far as the United States is concerned there still remains, a "technical continuance" of a legal state of war. That phrase, a "technical continuance" of a state of war, was used by Mr. Seward in 1868 to describe a condition that had arisen when hostilities ceased between Spain and the allied Republics on the west coast of South America. It is interesting to note that the condition lasted through many years. In fact Chile did not resume friendly relations with Spain until 1884, nor did Ecuador until 1886, 20 years after hostilities had ceased. In some respects our relations with Germany have made greater progress. We have had an informal diplomatic mission in Berlin for several months and trade has been resumed to a very considerable extent. Our exports to Germany for the current fiscal year are somewhat in excess of those for 1913, which amounted to $351,000,000. We are not in any real sense at war with Germany and Germany is not at war with us.

Germany fought the United States savagely while we were at war, and she exercised the powers of a belligerent in seizing property of American owners which was within German jurisdiction. Germany has been returning such property to the American owners, however, and if it be true that she did not declare war against us there was no German enactment which it was necessary either to repeal or to supersede in order that German courts might give full recognition to the peace status.

The treaty itself fixes the time when the war shall end for Germany. The last sentence of the preliminary provisions of the treaty, immediately following the list of Representatives at the peace conference, reads as follows:

> From the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate. From that moment and subject to the provisions of this treaty official relations with Germany and with any of the German States will be resumed by the allied associated powers.

The war terminates when the treaty comes into force. When does that treaty come into force?

Article 440 of the treaty provides that a first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications shall be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany, on the one hand, and by three of the principal allied and associated powers, on the other hand. Then comes a sentence which does not affect the United States, because we have not ratified the treaty:

> From the date of this first procès-verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it.

That sentence does not affect us, I repeat, because we did not ratify the treaty. It does affect Germany, however, and all ratifying powers. The next sentence affects Germany's legal attitude toward the United States and all other powers that were at war, whether they ratified the treaty or not. It reads as follows:

> For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the treaty.

For the determination of all periods of time; the period of the war, the period of the peace following the war, and the determination of all other periods of time provided for in the treaty.

> In all other respects the treaty will enter into force for each power at the date of the deposit of its ratification.

It is only "in all other respects" that the treaty enters into force for each power at the date of its ratification. In this one respect, namely, the determination of all periods of time, including the termination of Germany's war with all her enemies, the treaty has already gone into force. Germany is not at war.

We are not at war with Germany in Germany. We are not at war with Germany on the high seas. There is only one place where we are at war with Germany; that is on our own statute books. The passage of this resolution will end the war there and bring our laws into harmony with the facts.

But I have dwelt too long on this phase of the subject. Let me spend the remainder of the limited time at my disposal on a point which, for the purposes of this discussion, is of greater importance.

Most of the criticism of this resolution has been directed at the second section of it, in which it undertakes to safeguard the interests of the United States, especially the clause in which we expressly reserve all the rights stipulated for us in the treaty of Versailles. It has been said time after time during this debate that no rights can be stipulated for any nation that is not a party to the treaty; that we could claim no rights under the treaty which we did not ratify. I wish to show that this particular treaty does stipulate rights for several nations that did not even sign it, that took no part in negotiating it, but which were, nevertheless, intended by the high contracting parties to be entitled to certain rights under its provisions.

In stipulating rights for various classes of beneficiaries the treaty makes use of several different phrases to designate them. In the first place, rights are stipulated for "the high contracting powers." That phrase refers, of course, to those powers only which signed and ratified the treaty, and thus became parties to the contract. Choosing one out of many examples that might be mentioned, I refer to section 1 of the annex to article 298 of the treaty. I read from this section:

In accordance with the provisions of article 297, paragraph (d), the validity of vesting orders and of orders for the winding up of businesses or companies, and of any other orders, directions, decisions, or instructions of any court or any department of the Government of any of the high contracting parties made or given, in pursuance of war legislation with regard to enemy property, rights, and interests is confirmed.

In like manner section 2 of the same annex protects the rights not of the high contracting parties but of the "allied and associated powers."

No claim or action shall be made or brought against any allied or associated power or against any persons acting on behalf of or under the direction of any legal authority or department of the Government of such a power by Germany or by any German national wherever resident in respect of any act or omission with regard to his property, rights, or interests during the war or in preparation for the war. Similarly no claim or action shall be made or brought against any person in respect to any act or omission under or in accordance with the exceptional war measures, laws, or regulations of any allied or associated power.

"Any person!" Why there were several persons who did not sign the treaty. The world is full of them, and their rights are protected by that section of the treaty.

This section, you have observed, protects the rights of "any allied or associated power." The allied and associated powers are named in the preamble to the treaty—a list of 27 of them. Now, if in one section of this part of the treaty rights of the high contracting parties are protected, and if in the next section the rights of the allied and associated powers are protected, it is obvious that the two clauses mean two things. If the makers of the treaty had meant the same thing, they would have used the same phrase. They used different phrases, and those phrases mean different things.

Still another phrase is used in the treaty to distinguish a third group of powers from the two groups which I have already mentioned, and to secure for them certain rights which are not granted to all the allied and associated powers. Article 119 of the treaty reads as follows:

Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.

The very first sentence of the treaty defines that phrase:

The United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, these powers being described in the present treaty as the principal allied and associated powers.

It is to these powers, mentioned by name as constituting this group, and not to those of them who by ratifying the treaty became high contracting parties, that Germany renounces her overseas possessions. One of the rights "stipulated for us" in this article of the treaty, while not of the greatest importance, has been brought to public notice in a way that has attracted the attention of even those who ordinarily are not interested in our foreign affairs. One of Germany's overseas possessions, thus renounced, was the island of Yap. When four of the principal allied and associated powers disposed of a possession which Germany had renounced to five of them, the United States asserted a right to a voice in the disposition of the island.

Other examples of rights stipulated for the five principal allied and associated powers will be found in article 249 of the treaty, which provides that Germany shall pay the total cost of maintaining the armies of the allied and associated powers in occupied German territory, and in articles 297 and 298 which provide that private property of nationals of allied and associated powers seized by Germany shall be returned to the owners.

Other rights are guaranteed to Denmark in article 110. Rights are guaranteed also to Russia in articles 116 and 117. Russia and Denmark did not sign the treaty. Denmark was not even at war and is not one of the allied and associated powers, but entirely a third party. I wish to call your attention still to another fact. In article 356 the treaty provides:

Vessels of all nations, and their cargoes, shall have the same rights and privileges as those which are granted to vessels belonging to the Rhine navigation, and to their cargoes.

If the treaty provides, and if Germany is bound by treaty obligation entered into with England, France, Italy, and other ratifying nations to grant to the vessels of all nations the same rights on the Rhine that certain specified vessels have, what becomes of the contention that no power that is not a party to the treaty can have any rights under the treaty?

The treaty specifically provides that the vessels of all nations shall have certain rights, and nobody will claim that all nations are parties to the treaty. The treaty, of course, takes care of the rights of the contracting parties which, by ratifying the treaty, have assumed the obligations of the contract. It also stipulates rights for the five principal allied and associated powers, by implication, whether they have ratified the treaty or not; it stipulates rights for the whole group of 27 allied and associated powers, and it stipulates rights for the vessels of all nations. The United States is certainly one of the "all nations" to whose ships these rights are stipulated. It is certainly one of the principal allied and associated powers, for it is mentioned by name in the clause of the treaty which defines that phrase. What does the phrase mean? Allied and associated in making the treaty? By no means. Allied and associated in making the war. Nobody will deny we had something to do with making the war. We were not one of the allied nations; we were an associate nation. We chose the policy of not making an alliance. Why? The only alliance that existed was an agreement that none of those powers would make a separate peace with Germany. What did that mean? Men have tried to say we are making a separate peace with Germany. The phrase "separate peace" has a well-understood significance in international usage. When nations are at war against the common enemy the only way one of them can make a separate peace is by leaving the war first and abandoning the others to fight alone. [Applause.]

That is the reprehensible thing. No nation did that in this war except Russia. Russia was the nation that made a separate peace and abandoned the Allies to finish the war without Russian help. We saw it through. Of course we did. And to say now that we can make a separate peace is absolute nonsense. It is an attempt to use a phrase that carries some obloquy. We had made no alliance or agreement not to make a separate peace. We could have made our own peace without violating any treaty, but we did not abandon our associates. We stayed with them and gave the claims of the Allies all our weight and influence until Germany agreed to the treaty the Allies demanded. We have not abandoned them, and do not intend to do so.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. What power other than the United States was an associate power in this war?

Mr. TEMPLE. None of the principals. There were some of the smaller ones that I do not recall now.

Mr. REAVIS. When it uses the term "associated power," is it any stronger in granting rights to this country than if the term "United States" was used in the treaty?

Mr. TEMPLE. The term "United States" is used in defining that phrase.

Mr. REAVIS. When "associated power" is used, it must refer to the United States.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; but we do not need to reach that conclusion by inference. We have the direct definition of the treaty to that effect, that the United States is one of the principal allied and associated powers, and wherever that phrase is used in the treaty it can not be used without including the United States. Whatever is stipulated, therefore, for "the principal allied and associated powers" is stipulated for us as one of them. Whatever is stipulated for the whole group of 27 "allied and associated powers" is stipulated for the United States as one of them—allied and associated in the war, and having certain rights as victors in the war, not as partners in the treaty. We were not allied with them in making the treaty; we are not associated with them in the ratification of the treaty. Certainly we were associated in the fighting of the war. And the nations that were on the winning side with us will not attempt to deprive us of our rights.

Now, the question arises, Will any treaty hereafter be necessary? Why, of course, a treaty will be necessary; not a treaty to end the war, but a treaty to determine the relations that will exist in the future between the United States and Germany.

What about reparations that we claim, that we expressly reserve—reparations, indemnities, and the like? We shall, of course, have to come to an understanding with the other powers that were fighting against Germany. We can not settle those questions with Germany.

Germany has turned everything she has over to the reparations commission. We can not do business with a bankrupt concern that has gone into the hands of a receiver except by doing business with the receiver. We shall have to have an understanding not only with Germany, but with the other powers that were associated with us in the war; and I still believe, as the President said when he stood before us here on the 12th of April last, that the easiest way through, the wisest course, would be to "engage under the present treaty," with whatever safeguards may be necessary.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman will expire in half a minute.

Mr. TEMPLE. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized for two and one-half minutes.

Mr. TEMPLE. One other point I wish to turn my attention to for a moment. A great deal has been said throughout the country about "an irreconcilable quarrel" between the Senate and the House which has delayed this resolution.

I have been rather familiar with the situation, and I do not know of any "irreconcilable quarrel" between the House and the Senate on this subject. A year ago we passed a resolution in this form, merely declaring the war at an end. The Senate amended it so that it repealed the resolution of April 6, 1917, by which we declared war. The same difference exactly arose then that has arisen again between the House and the Senate. This time the resolution started at the other end of the Capitol. The Senate passed their form of resolution first. We have now substituted the form which we prefer, and I have a decided preference for it. I do not believe there is any more "irreconcilable difference" between the House and Senate now than there was a year ago. The two Houses agreed then, and we shall agree now. I believe, in fact, that there is a prospect of getting something that is a good deal more like our own resolution than the one passed at that time. There is no quarrel between the House and Senate. There is no delay on that account but a delay for very good reasons, which have been sufficiently indicated by other gentlemen and which I may take the liberty of discussing at another time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yields back one minute.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I am very much in favor of this resolution and regret that I could not get the time to state fully the reasons which have led me to that conclusion. Under the permission just granted, however, I will say this: As a rule, I believe that the burden is on the proponents of any bill or resolution to give the reasons why it should be adopted; but in this instance I think the reverse is true.

Hostilities ceased on the 11th of November, 1918, about two and a half years ago, and I believe that the burden now is upon those who opposite this resolution to show why the technical state of war which still exists should not be formally ended.

In the first place, I think that the restoration of a status of peace would accomplish much good. I am sure it would materially help the German people, because I can not avoid the conclusion that they could much more easily finance their industrial, agricultural, and commercial enterprises if they were at peace with the United States than they can under present conditions. It is true that there are no restrictions now being placed by the President upon our trade with Germany, but it is also true that no citizen of Germany could go into the courts of our country nor could our citizens go into the courts of Germany to enforce any contract entered into between citizens of the two countries.

The fact that it would help to rehabilitate Germany would of itself be a sufficient reason for me to vote for it unless I believed that it would work harm to our own people.

I have no hatred in my heart for the German people. I voted for the war and for the draft and for the other measures which we adopted for the prosecution of the war. I believed and still believe that the German Government sinned grievously and wickedly in the manner in which she conducted her submarine operations, and I believe also that she has grievously answered it. The mighty military machine with which she threatened to overrun the world was defeated on the battle field and she was forced to sign an armistice upon such terms as we in cooperation with our allies dictated.

Her military masters were humbled; the Hohenzollern dynasty, which broke the peace of the world, was overthrown, and the Kaiser himself is now a fugitive in a strange land. There is no reason that I know of to fear further trouble from that source, and, speaking for my single self, I hope there will arise out of the ashes of the old imperial monarchy a new Germany inspired by better ideals, the ideals of peace and righteousness, and in this I wish for them prosperity and happiness, the fruits of peace and liberty.

I believe, however, that the establishment of a status of peace by reviving the industrial activities of Germany will most surely be reflected in enlarged trade and commerce between the two peoples, and in that way our people, most of all possibly the cotton producers of the South, will be benefited.

Gentlemen have quoted figures to show that our trade with Germany has already been revived and that we are selling them now more of American products than we sold them before the war. However true this may be, it is not a fact that our cotton trade has been restored. Before the war we sold Germany in round figures 3,000,000 bales of cotton. Last year we sold her less than three-quarters of a million bales.

The opponents of this resolution insist that we should make peace with Germany in the orderly way prescribed by the Constitution, and I agree to that fully, but we have not done it. The responsibility for that failure, however, does not rest upon this House. The President and the Senate jointly are charged with the duty of making treaties, but the President was unable to negotiate a treaty to which the Senate would give consent, and the Senate was unable to amend the treaty in a way which the President would accept, and the result is that although the battle has ended we are still technically at war. This, however, is the first opportunity which I have had to vote for a resolution which I thought would, in a way not forbidden by the Constitution, establish peace, and I do not feel that I can justify a failure on my part to act now by citing the failure of the President or the Senate, or both, to act when the matter was with them.

We are told that it would be dishonorable to make a separate peace with Germany. If that be true, then our situation is hopeless. We speak of it as "the World War" because practically all the nations of the earth were engaged in it, but every one of them has long since made peace with our recent enemies and we alone remain at war. This being true, we must either make a separate peace with Germany or remain forever at war.

I understand, of course, that when we said we would not make a separate peace with Germany we meant we would not make a separate peace during the progress of the war, as Russia did at Brest-Litovsk, and thus abandon our allies while the fight was on. All of our allies were equally emphatic in their declaration that they would not make separate peace and I think they kept the faith, although as a matter of fact after the war ended they all did make a peace to which we were not a party. It is urged again, and that with much show of feeling, that we should not end the war before a treaty is negotiated with Germany, because it is claimed that we would thereby surrender a great advantage. "When the President sits down at the table with the representatives of the German Government to write a treaty," they urge, "we want him to enter into the negotiations as victor and the German representatives as vanquished."

I fail to see any merit whatever in this contention. I do not believe the President or his representatives at that conference would have the slightest advantage by reason of the fact that a technical state of war still existed. What could he do then that he could not do if this resolution had already been enacted? Suppose that Germany would not agree to such a treaty as the President was willing to adopt. Is it the wish or the belief of the opponents of this resolution that the President should then undertake to force Germany into submission by renewing hostilities and summon us again to the bloody arbitrament of the sword?

Some gentleman has said the fact that we are still at war technically would be a club in the President's hand. Suppose it is. Would we have him use that club and thereby plunge this country into another war because Germany would not agree that we might subject $400,000,000 now in the hands of our Alien Property Custodian to the satisfaction of the $221,000,000 in claims which our citizens have filed against Germany as the result of her unlawful submarine warfare? If we are to resort to war for that or for any other reason, I believe that before we take that awful step the Representatives whom the people have elected to Congress should first give their assent to it.

I have great respect for the President of the United States. I have faith in his patriotism, confidence in his high purpose, and I have no fear or thought that he would plunge us again into war; but during the past two or three days I have heard gentlemen, Members of this House whom I hold in very high esteem and whose patriotism I would not question, declare that if Germany would not submit to whatever terms we dictated that they would be in favor of resuming hostilities.

If this resolution is not passed before the President undertakes to negotiate a treaty of peace with Germany, he alone would be charged with the duty and the responsibility of determining whether to order our military forces to renew the bloody business which the armistice ended if Germany failed to agree to the terms which he proposed.

If this resolution should pass before he undertook that treaty, before he could summon our boys to arms again Congress would have to make a declaration of war. This, to my mind, is infinitely preferable and is sufficient reason to justify my vote for the resolution.

One gentleman has declared, and his statement met with evident approval by others, that before we agree to a status of peace and the restoration of amicable relations with Germany that she must be further humiliated by acknowledging her blood guilt in provoking the war.

There was a time, Mr. Speaker, when such a spirit prevailed in this House and when legislation in consonance therewith was written upon our statute books under the leadership of those whose shiboleth was "treason must be made odious." I do not believe, however, that the laws passed in the years immediately succeeding our great Civil War have or will hereafter sound in history to the credit of those who wrote them.

When the President takes up with the officials of the present Republic of Germany a negotiation of a treaty of peace, amity, and commerce, I believe he will be inspired only by a desire to do justice and to write a peace of righteousness, and to do this I do not believe that he needs any bludgeon.

I shall vote for this resolution because I have in my heart the same desire which one of our great military captains expressed when he said, in other and sadder days, "Let us have peace."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has that privilege under the general privilege that has been granted. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has 31 minutes remaining.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this resolution, as it has been presented here on former occasions, or in its present form, or any form. I am opposed to it because I have not been able during all of this consideration by the House to bring myself to believe that the supreme struggle of the ages to save free institutions and free governments should be ended on behalf of the United States by a simple ex parte resolution merely declaring the existence of a state of peace. [Applause.]

I do not believe that such a titanic struggle, with all of its cross-currents of interests, involving such momentous issues, can be or should be ended after the manner of a friendly wrestling match—by the mere clasp of the hand. [Applause.]

It is said in behalf of this resolution that it merely announces the fact of peace. I wish with all my heart that it partook only of this innocent and harmless character. I wish with all my heart that it merely announced the fact of peace, the terms of which were fixed and in accord with the high purposes of America when we entered the war.

But this resolution not only announces the fact of peace, but it is the agency, the very instrumentality, by which peace is to be effected. Disguise it as we may by saying that further action will be taken later by the Executive, apologize for it, as I believe we will forever do if we pass it, this resolution is the method by which Congress proposes to end the greatest struggle of all the ages; and end it how? End it without a condition, save that we shall not lose any rights that we acquired through the armistice; end it without exacting a pledge, a promise, or a guaranty for the future [applause]; end it without a requirement that the offending nation shall make good any part of that which it has so wantonly and cruelly destroyed [applause]; end it without even an apology, and without evidence whatsoever of repentance; and, worst of all, and to me almost unthinkable, as it came here from the other end of the Capitol, it sought to end the war from its very beginning [applause] by repealing the declaration of war; by going back behind the years of the war, years sanctified and glorified by heroic sacrifice at home and abroad, end it by going back through the hospitals and wards of sickness and pain, back across the fields of death and glory; end it by going back beyond the white crosses that mark the resting places of our dead in alien lands they died to save; back to the 6th day of April, 1917, in order to end the war from the beginning—as though it had never been; by repealing the resolution enacted in this Hall on that memorable day when we put the genius, the wealth, the flower of our young manhood, and the might of America on the side of the defenders of human liberty, exhausted and bleeding, but gallantly holding the citadels of civilization until we could arrive. [Applause.] We can repeal the declaration of war if we want to, but, thank God, the record of American valor performed under that declaration will remain forever, for it is written across the very skies in the blood of our sons and is beyond the power of legislatures to repeal or destroy. [Applause.]

No man is more anxious for the return of normal conditions of peace than I. I do not cherish in my soul hatred or animosity toward any people. I am anxious for peace, but I am not so anxious for it that I am willing either to repeal our declaration of war or substitute a clasp of the hand for just and honorable terms and conditions of settlement. [Applause.]

We can not be too particular about the terms of this settlement, because the conditions imposed upon the responsible aggressor must be such as will forever remain a wholesome restraint upon ambitious rulers of future days. Monarchs of coming days will, no doubt, dream again the old dreams of world dominion and will be fired again with the old zeal for world control. But if we do our duty now and weary not, they will hesitate long and ponder well the fate of him who in 1914, as the responsible head of a great nation, thought himself to be the chosen instrument of God to impose his personal will upon all mankind.

But it is argued that diplomatic and trade relations should be resumed. But what matters a vacant embassy on Massachusetts Avenue for a while longer or even a few weeks more of inconvenient trade, as compared with righteous and honorable terms and conditions of settlement of all the issues involved in this great struggle.

But it is said that Great Britain and France and Italy and Belgium are at peace, and why not the United States? But did these great nations make peace simply by saying that the war is over? Did they end the war without terms or conditions or pledges or promises or guaranties for the future? Oh, no!

Lovers of liberty of all times to come will rejoice that Great Britain and France and Italy and Belgium required the offending nation to admit its wrongdoing and accept full responsibility for the war; that the offending nation was forced to give up its mighty fleet, disarm its people, and make reparation for what it had destroyed up to the very limit of its ability. Such are some of the conditions and terms imposed by our associates in the war as a condition precedent to the establishment of peace. [Applause.]

But what of America? What do we here propose to do? To me the almost unthinkable thing of establishing peace without terms or conditions or pledges or promises or guaranties for the future, and then, with the innocence of little children, hope that the damage we do here may somehow be repaired hereafter by diplomacy. [Applause.] America's influence in the world should not be thus put in jeopardy. [Applause.]

When statesmen of future days shall review these times and study this world settlement I know they will turn expectantly to America to ascertain the conditions under which this great Republic of justice and honor was willing that the greatest of all international offenders in the history of the world should take its place again in the family of nations. God grant that they may not be obliged to measure America's conception of international duty or to judge America's standard of international morality by what they find in this weak and pusillanimous document known as the Knox resolution.

If this resolution is the best that Congress can do when it strays outside of its own jurisdiction and ventures into the realm of international affairs, we have this further proof of the wisdom of the fathers in placing the control of our foreign relations in another branch of the Government.

It is as clear to me as the sun at high noon that we should leave the initiation of foreign policies to the President and his great Secretary of State. Secretary Hughes has already shown such wisdom and courage and learning and vision as characterized only the very greatest of his illustrious predecessors.

Congress should not attempt to interfere in the settlement of this, the most difficult, the most dangerous, the most complex, and the most kaleidoscopic situation that has ever confronted an American President.

Let us keep to our own normal, constitutional functions and leave the President to his. He has been in office now but a few weeks, but the country has already come to trust him and believe in him implicitly. More and more he feels, and must feel, the heavy responsibilities of these troubled days. More and more he has come to realize how large a part his decisions must play in shaping the course of events, not only in America but throughout the world. He is keenly alive to his responsibilities and appreciates his human limitations as no other President since Lincoln. Yet as he guides the ship through the storm and the fog and the night he is confident and unafraid. For he has come to know, as all men come to know when charged with mighty destinies, that after all there is, there must be, an overruling Providence guiding human affairs and shaping the course of human events, and that men, after all, are but the agents chosen to carry out the larger divine purpose and that nations that place their trust in Him and follow His leadings will come safely through the storm and the night.

We must not forget in this hour of world peril under our forms of law that the President is our pilot on the sea of international affairs. Within the unquestioned scope of his constitutional authority we can safely trust him with the fortunes of the Republic. Let us not distract him by constantly clamoring at his side or by attempting to take the wheel. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the question of whether, under our Constitution, we can by an act of Congress enter into contractual relations with another Government. I merely desire to say that I do not believe Congress has such power. I think it is an invasion of the treaty-making power, which is a constitutional prerogative of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I believe this power carries with it a duty which should be performed by the Executive in negotiating such contractual relations, and that he should not undertake to pass it up to Congress.

I think both the Knox and the Porter resolutions are objectionable on this ground, and I should therefore vote against this resolution if I had no other objection to it.

Nor will I discuss at any length the moral question involved in the desertion by this country of the nations with which we were associated in the World War by the negotiation of a separate peace, either by congressional action or by the Executive, with the powers against which we were together at war.

The war had set a great task for our statesmanship. The best thought of the world demanded that a serious attempt be made by the leaders of the allied and associated Governments to formulate a treaty of peace which would prevent the recurrence of war. Every rightful impulse of the human heart was in accord with that purpose. For the first time in the turbulent annals of the human race such a project had become possible. At that critical juncture Republican leadership completely failed, and the Republican Party put duty to party above duty to country or humanity and defeated that wish of our people and of the world. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The purpose of the Republican Party is the same to-day that it has been since it carried the election in 1918—only this purpose is stronger since the election of 1920.

It was declared that all of Wilson's policies would be repudiated and that there would be established a separate peace with Germany as soon as a Republican Congress could pass the law and a Republican President could sign it.

Such is the purpose of this resolution, and all I desire to say about it is that a separate peace with Germany is inconsistent with American honor and will be a severe blow to American prestige and statesmanship. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The action of the Republican Party has thrown international relations into chaos and impaired the processes of national life until there has been an accumulation of domestic problems which the Republican Party is unable to adjust, and which can not be satisfactorily dealt with until our relationship to the rest of the world is determined. This the Republican Party seems incapable of understanding or doing.

I do not care to discuss the League of Nations or the other parts of the treaty of Versailles other than to refer to the statement frequently made in this debate that the League of Nations came before the people and they decided against it by 7,000,000 majority, and to contrast this statement with that of 31 of President Harding's strongest supporters, who stated that the question was not a league or no league, but the question was whether we should join the league under an agreement containing the exact provisions negotiated by President Wilson at Paris or under an agreement omitting or modifying some of these provisions. And the conclusion drawn by thousands of voters from the statement made by these gentlemen was that the surest way to get the league was by the election of President Harding.

Among the signers were two members of President Harding's Cabinet. I do not know whether these gentlemen were fooled by President Harding or whether they fooled the American public. But I think they owe an explanation to thousands of people who favored the league and who were induced by this statement to vote for Mr. Harding for President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On last Saturday I said to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Republicans had voted twice in this House for the resolution which repealed the declaration of war and which he has denounced as a provision to apologize to Germany. He took issue with me, but later on he admitted that they had done that. Under the leadership of these gentlemen on the Committee on Foreign Affairs you were led last year to vote for what they now say is a repudiation of the war, and what they tell you now is an apology to Germany. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But aside from all this, I think the resolution has no value. It is contended that it will establish a technical state of peace with the enemy country, and that that will increase our trade with Germany, especially our export trade, and will enable our people to sell more cotton, tobacco, wheat, meat, and manufactured products to the German people. As has been clearly pointed out in this debate, such will not be the case. We are trading as freely with Germany to-day as we are with any nation in Europe, and we have the largest export trade we have ever had with her.

It was stated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] that this trade is decreasing. It is a fact that it did fall off $4,000,000 in April, but for the fiscal year 1921 it will be very much larger than it was in the fiscal year 1920 or any other year in the history of our trade relations with that country.

Our financial institutions in this country are giving the German people all the credit the conditions of that country will justify, and we are selling to Germany everything that her financial condition and credit will permit her to buy.

President Harding's speech in the Senate on May 15, 1920, strongly sustains this position. He did not advocate the resolution for the practical purpose of promoting trade, nor did he advocate it, as some of the gentlemen have done upon this floor, for the altruistic purpose of establishing peace. He advocated it simply for the purpose of showing the then President of the United States that one man could not run the country. If President Harding desires this resolution to protect the country against his own usurpation of power and to show him that he can not run the country, I do not think it will be necessary, because that fact will be fully demonstrated to him in a very few days when he finds out that he and the Republican leaders of this House will not be able to defeat the Borah resolution looking to disarmament. He will learn then that the wishes of one man will not be able to thwart the wishes of the American people in their desire for the reduction of governmental expenses and to secure peace by bringing about international disarmament. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] says it will give them 105 consular appointees and other officials.

Mr. FLOOD. That will appeal to Republicans, because with the world in a state of almost complete collapse, with our farmers getting nothing for their products, with 4,000,000 men out of work, the Republican administration has sat here three months and done nothing except appoint Republicans to office. [Laughter.]

But this resolution not only has no value, but it will be a serious menace to tremendous property interests in this country.

If we restore the status of peace before our differences with the enemy countries are settled, particularly with Germany, we surrender the advantage of position which we hold as a belligerent and which all of the allied powers had when they negotiated and forced their terms of peace upon Germany. Instead of dealing with her as a victor with a vanquished foe, we would have to deal with her with perfect equality, and take what she chose to give us by way of reparation for the wrongs and injuries she has done to us and our nationals.

The losses to this country and its nationals would be billions of dollars.

1. The treaty and arrangements ancillary thereto dealt in a precise and definite way with enemy shipping. Without these provisions, great uncertainty prevails as to the title to and right to the use of German ships. The title of the United States to German ships which it seized during the war is very doubtful, as the ships have never been put through a prize court, and these ships now come under the jurisdiction of the reparation commission. Until title is confirmed in the United States, uncertainty with attendant danger to American interests must remain.

2. The funds in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, amounting to nearly $500,000,000, can not be dealt with otherwise than by restoration to their owners unless German consent to the application of these funds to other purposes is obtained through a treaty. This resolution does not pretend to accomplish this result. International law does not permit the confiscation of private property unless the enemy Government consents to the use of such property for the satisfaction of claims against it, or like purposes. The Versailles treaty contains Germany's assent to the use of Alien Property Custodian funds to pay claims of the United States and its nationals against Germany and debts of Germany to America. In the interest of justice, as well as of business, these claims should be paid. We would have a great deal of trouble getting Germany's assent to the use of these funds for that purpose after the status of peace is restored.

3. The United States has an immediate interest in the proceedings of the reparation commission, which is in no way taken care of by this resolution. This commission has control over the payment by Germany of the cost of the armies of occupation, including our own. They owe us now between $240,000,000 and $250,000,000. The passage of this resolution may cost America this fund.

4. By the passage of this resolution we invite representatives of German commercial houses to overrun our country and sell the products of their country, with its cheap labor, in competition with ours, and with no such rights to the representatives of American business, and they will not have such right until an agreement is negotiated with Germany.

The one-sided operation of the resolution is illustrated by the condition in which an American is admitted into Germany at present. He secures a passport to some neighboring friendly country and then applies to a German consul to visé it. This is given or withheld according to the whim of the consul. That condition would obtain if this resolution passed, because Germany on her part would not have made peace with us, while Germans would be permitted to come to this country as freely as any other friendly alien. A distinguished Senator has said that this resolution should be entitled, "A measure for the relief of the German people."

5. The passage of this resolution to bring about a status of peace in the absence of a treaty would revive the commercial and most of the treaties existing between this country and Germany which were suspended during belligerency. It would restore our treaty status with that country as it was just prior to the war.

I do not know whether this resolution will ever become a law. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] says there is no wide difference of opinion between the Senate and the House. I do not see how the Republicans of the Senate, unless they have lost all self-respect, after their resolution has been denounced upon the floor of this House and in the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs as a repudiation of the war and as an apology to Germany, as a blotting out of Chateau Thierry and Belleau Wood and the Argonne, can agree to yield their judgment as to what they thought was proper for the American Senate to do. I do not see how gentlemen over here, unless they have lost all their self-respect, after what they have said about the Senate resolution, can vote for it if it is brought back here as a substitute or an amendment for the House resolution. So it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is about as much difference of opinion between the House and Senate Republicans upon this proposition as there is upon the proposition of disarmament. [Applause.]

Germany has tariffs of two kinds, one the autonomous and the other the conventional tariff, the conventional tariff being much lower than the autonomous tariff. The conventional tariff applies to countries that have particular treaty arrangements with Germany. At the beginning of the war we had no such treaty agreements. The passage of this resolution would subject our people to the discriminatory autonomous duties of Germany, while most other nations would be relieved from this through their participation in the peace treaty, which the United States has rejected. This would amount to an embargo on much of our commerce.

From whatever angle this resolution is viewed it presents itself as a proposition not only ineffective in achieving its proclaimed purpose but as a sure method of confusing our foreign relations, injecting new and complicated questions into an already difficult situation, and involving a surrender of American rights and an impairment of American prestige and honor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The full power of action rests with the Republican majority. Less than eight months ago that party achieved the greatest political victory in the history of this country. Republicans feel proud of that victory; they have a right to feel proud of it. But speaking as a member of the minority party I want to say to them that whatever else may be said of the campaign of 1920, this always must be said. The Democratic Party did not dip the flag. It fought the good fight; it kept the faith, and in the light of events it faces the future with undimmed courage, proud of its achievements and confident of the verdict of history. [Applause. on the Democratic side.]

I am opposed to this resolution because I do not think it comports with the simplest dictates of common honesty for a great country like ours to undertake by this legislation to retain all the benefits and advantages of the treaties that were made with our enemies, and refuse to assume any of the obligations contained in those treaties.

I am proud to be an American citizen. I am proud to be an American Representative in this House from the great State of Virginia, a State which has always stood by its convictions and maintained its honor at any cost. I am proud of the power of my country and the way in which up to this time she has exercised this great power, and I will not cast a vote that I think will weaken that power, lessen its prestige, and leave a stain upon the good faith and fair name of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This resolution seems to be the corner stone of the administration's foreign policy, and yet it will not do a thing to restore peace to the stricken world; not a thing to increase American foreign trade or to relieve distressed conditions in this country.

Our European export trade is decreasing. Only with Germany and a few other European countries is it increasing, and as a result business conditions are growing worse instead of better. With 4,000,000 men out of employment, with all agricultural products depressed, with business stagnant, the administration and the majority have let three months elapse and done nothing to relieve this situation.

For the last two and a half years the Republican Party has played politics with the European situation. The European situation now is playing havoc with American prosperity.

To calm the rising storm of indignation in the country this resolution is brought in. Its avowed purpose is commercial, yet every intelligent man knows that it will not put an idle man to work, will not open a single closed factory, will not make a market for a single barrel of wheat, a single pound of tobacco, beef, or cotton. As President Harding clearly demonstrated, it will do nothing to bring relief to the depressed industrial conditions in America. Its proponents know it has but two purposes—to keep an unwise campaign pledge and to fool the people.

Germany destroyed our prosperity. She murdered our citizens; she denied us access to the seas; she violated her solemn treaties and the law of nations; she made war upon civilization. For these things we went to war, and not as Ambassador Harvey said, because we were afraid not to fight. We sent 2,000,000 men 3,000 miles across U-boat infested seas to France and we had over 2,000,000 men under arms in this country just as heroic and just as ready to go. We spent billions of dollars of treasure. Some 80,000 of these boys lost their lives on the battle fields of France and Flanders. Thousands of them are maimed for life. We whipped Germany and her allies to their knees, and would have dictated peace in Potsdam Palace but for the armistice. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Every nation that was associated with us in the war has dictated terms of peace to the enemy nations. Shall we tarnish the luster of this Nation by accepting and not dictating terms of settlement to our brutal and vanquished foe? I trust the Nation has not fallen so low as to say to our enemies, "Take what you wish, only give us an increased trade with Germany." [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be postponed until 5 o'clock, and that the additional time be equally divided between the two sides of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time for taking the vote be extended to 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the time ought to be consumed in answering parliamentary inquiries.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I want in good faith to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER. That is as to whether or not permission has been given to extend remarks to all persons or to only those who speak.

The SPEAKER. Only those who speak.

Mr. CARTER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think he ought to recognize gentlemen for that purpose until after 4.30 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, my object in taking the floor is to explain, so far as I can in the very brief time remaining for debate, why it is that notwithstanding my very strong objections to the reservations or conditions embraced in this resolution, I am nevertheless constrained by a sense of duty to my country and to humanity to vote for it and urge its adoption by the House.

The question we are considering is simply whether the Congress which declared the war that has been waged to success, the most decisive in history, shall now formally declare the peace which that success has established. If I understand the opposition to this resolution, it is based on two grounds. Some gentlemen deny that Congress has power to declare peace. Although they (and everyone else) concede that peace actually exists, they nevertheless insist that a state of peace can not be declared except through a treaty negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate. Other gentlemen oppose this proceeding because, even conceding that it is within the constitutional power of Congress, they insist that power should not be exercised at this time and in this way, but that negotiation of a peace should be left wholly and exclusively to the President.

Mr. Speaker, both these objections, I submit, are extravagant; arising, I venture to say, from a certain confusion of thought concerning treaties, their scope, significance, and value, into which some gentlemen seem to have fallen. I believe, sir, that it is as clearly within the power of Congress to declare peace as to declare war; one being the necessary complement of the other. I believe also that it is the duty—the pressing, imperative duty—of Congress to exercise this power at once.

The main argument offered against passage of this measure is that through a treaty alone can seizure by this Government of certain property belonging to Germans be validated. Here we find that confusion of thought, which I have mentioned, betraying its victims into contending that the greatest war in history is to be ended by attorneyship rather than by statesmanship. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] in referring to this resolution as an ex parte proceeding, has illustrated strikingly this tendency to deal with an international question in a spirit of attorneyship. The degree to which that tendency has embarrassed us in reaching sensible conclusions the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD] has very effectively pointed out. It is due probably to the superabundance of legal talent upon this floor. [Laughter.]

The function of attorneyship is to invoke the law of the land on behalf of one party to a dispute arising within its limits. Law has been defined as a command laid upon an inferior by a superior, who, if the command be resisted, can enforce it by pains and penalties. The sovereign—that is to say, the State—whose intervention is invoked for the settlement of a dispute has full power to enforce its decision, and in every civilized country this power is always exercised.

Disputes between nations and questions affecting their relations to each other are on a footing radically different. Every State, being itself a sovereign, can not be compelled to submit a dispute with another State to any tribunal whatever and still retain its sovereignty. How to adjust differences, to compose quarrels, or end a war between independent sovereignties belongs not to the domain of attorneyship but to the domain of statesmanship. If the House will approach this question in the light of statesmanship—as I hope and believe it will—it must realize that according to what has been said, even by gentlemen opposing this resolution—according to what is conceded with absolute unanimity everywhere—we are now actually in a state of peace; and being in a state of peace, it would, in my judgment, be little short of treason to our highest interests if we hesitate to declare it. [Applause.]

I do not think it necessary to occupy much time in discussing the constitutional power of Congress to pass this resolution, because the way in which that objection has been discussed indicates that even those who raised it in perfunctory fashion have little faith in the soundness of their contention. And, indeed, its utter unsoundness is self-evident. If, with the power to declare war imposed on us so distinctly and unreservedly that we could not divest ourselves of it if we would, we are without power to declare peace, then this Government is organized for confusion and disaster, not for order and efficiency. Conceive for a moment the consequences that must follow if Congress, which has the undoubted right to declare war, should be denied the right to declare peace. In that event war having been once declared could be ended only by the President. Any agreement of his with a foreign Government must, of course, be ratified by the Senate before it could acquire the force of a treaty. But no one can force the President to open negotiations for a treaty. He can allow the declaration of war to stand indefinitely, and while it remains in force he has all the power which a state of war confers upon the Chief Executive.

At this moment I do not believe there is a single human being in the country who would not be shocked if warlike operations were resumed against Germany or Austria. Yet the President of the United States might send 100,000 armed men to-morrow into Germany. He might undertake to annex the Ruhr Valley; to seize the whole of Brandenburg, including Berlin. And if he proceeded to do this, he would be acting strictly within his constitutional rights. When I suggested this possibility in the course of private discussion with some friends who are opposed to the pending measure, it was at once stated that if the President did such a thing he would be impeached. Consider the significance of that attitude. The President of the United States would be impeached by Congress for doing the very thing which Congress had enjoined upon him! Could extravagance of conception go further?

The power of Congress is limited to declaring war. Making war is exclusively with the President. How he may make it, when he may make it, where he may make it, is his alone to decide. If then we are at war now it is his business to make war. Having commanded him to make war and equipped him with the power to wage it, we could not question his act should he exercise that power in any direction that to him seems proper. Surely, then, it is the supreme duty of Congress to recall that command to make war, which many here would impeach the President for obeying.

Not merely for constitutional reasons but for reasons of convenience and efficiency this resolution should be promptly passed.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has pointed out with great force the advisability of withdrawing our troops from Germany. I do not think there is a gentleman on this side who disagrees with him or doubts that it is urgently demanded by consideration for our own welfare. But those gentlemen who, while holding this view, oppose the pending resolution, tell us that the President could withdraw these troops now under the law as it stands. I answer he has not done it. I say passage of this resolution by Congress will make him do it. And if it be of the highest interest to the American people that this be done, and Congress has power to compel it, then let the Congress without hesitation perform its constitutional duty. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen have worked themselves up to great excitement over what they seem to think will happen if we pass this resolution. I can not make out, however, from their speeches just what it is that they apprehend. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] seems to deplore with special vehemence the fact that we are ready, as he says, "to shake hands with Germany." But what would he have us do? Does the gentleman want us to make faces at her? [Laughter and applause.] Does he want us to execute a war dance around her? Just what else could we do to her? We can not take anything from her. Everything she has or is likely to have for many generations is already taken by the Allies whom we have made victors over her. She is not allowed to keep a single thing of any value except what in the judgment of her conquerors is essential to her industrial efficiency, and therefore to her capacity to supply the enormous continuing contributions of money and materials they have imposed on her. Germany is beaten; utterly, irretrievably beaten. She is prostrate. But as she lies helpless on the ground, America, who reduced her to this helplessness, is too chivalrous and, thank God, too strong to kick a prostrate enemy. [Applause.]

The passage of this resolution will not be of any benefit to Germany except in a remote degree. It will merely afford her freer access to the larger sources of credit which she needs for reenforcement of her productive energies. It is for ourselves that it is of pressing importance to declare the war at an end. This resolution, if adopted, will reestablish constitutional government in America. It will stop our officials from making war upon ourselves. It will reimpose upon our Government those restrictions and limitations through which it has been since its foundation the surest rampart of freedom and the most effective agency for the enforcement of justice ever established on this earth. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], answering the argument that passage of this resolution would at once abrogate all the laws restraining freedom of speech and of action placed on the statute books under the stress of war, said with great emphasis that most of these war laws have already been repealed and there remain in operation now only those repeal of which was prevented by action of the gentlemen on the other side. Well, I want all those that have been retained to follow those that have been repealed; and they will go with the passage of this resolution. Without this action on our part they will remain in operation indefinitely. This country, therefore, will not be secure in its own freedom until this state of war be ended by solemn declaration of Congress.

It may be considered a fanciful idea of mine that the President of the United States, while the declaration of war remains in force, could send troops into a country with which we are not in actual conflict. Mr. Speaker, that is not a fanciful idea. It is a statement founded entirely on unquestioned facts of history, and of very recent history. It was in precisely such a way that Bismarck, after making authority of the Hohenzollern family absolute in Prussia, succeeded in extending it over the whole of Germany.

It will be remembered that the old Prussian constitution forbade any increase in the army without the consent of Parliament, and that Wilhelm, afterwards first Emperor of Germany, when he acceded to the throne through the mental incapacity of his brother, believing a large army essential to the dignity and, indeed, to the security of Prussia, made an increase of the military establishment the main feature of his policy.

The Parliament having refused to sanction the increase he desired, the old King was on the point of abdicating when he appointed Bismarck his chancellor, who at once dismissed Parliament, created an army of the size which the King wanted, and then made war with the deliberate purpose of obtaining ratification of these constitutional violations through the approval which successful military movements were certain to evoke. And never was policy more abundantly vindicated by results. The war with Denmark and afterwards with Austria reconciled the Prussian people to the measures which they believed had led to such dazzling military successes.

So it is well within the bounds of possibility that a President of the United States—at variance, perhaps, with Congress—might take advantage of conditions precisely the same as those now actually existing to seize territory under some plausible pretext or other, relying upon the popular approval which is never refused to successful military operations for full vindication of his conduct. There would, however, be this difference between such a course and that pursued by Bismarck: The action of the American President would not need ratification. It would be entirely constitutional—taken not in violation, but in obedience, to his oath of office. Yet such action, far from redounding to the glory of the American people, would, we all agree, work deep injury to their welfare and cast a dark cloud on their fame. It is not for Germany, but for the United States, not for the people of any foreign country, but for ourselves; for the restoration of our constitutional system in its full integrity; for the security of our own freedom and the maintenance of our own national credit that I appeal to the whole membership of the House for enactment of this measure.

But gentlemen have said that the object of the war has not been accomplished. I deny that statement most emphatically and unreservedly. Never was object so glorious achieved so completely by success in battle so decisive.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] declared with rare eloquence that our purpose in entering the war was not to show our prowess with fists or sword, and I agree with him. No one could dispute a statement so true, conveyed in words so moving. But surely I can say with equal truth, though in plainer terms, that neither did we go into the war merely to pick up two dollars and a half or two millions and a half or two hundred millions and a half after the war was over, either in the way of reparations or of profit.

The gentleman contends that the property of Germans now held by the Alien Property Custodian can not be applied to satisfaction of claims for damages suffered by American citizens during the war except by a treaty "validating" the seizure. Here, the gentleman from Texas shows that same strange misapprehension of a treaty—its significance and its functions—which I mentioned in the beginning. Whatever title we have to that property was established when we seized it. No provisions of a treaty could add anything to the "rights" we now enjoy in this respect. It is for this reason that I regret inclusion in the pending resolution of any provisions respecting alleged rights acquired during the war. No right can be acquired or established by war except the right of seizure. Though seizure of property in war were ratified by a hundred treaties the party from whom it was taken would not hesitate to recapture it if he had sufficient force to do it. France in the treaty of Frankfort conceded Alsace-Lorraine to Germany. But the French people never ceased to assert, after the treaty was signed—and up to the time the last war began—their determination to regain these Provinces whenever they felt strong enough to attempt it. If we contemplated returning this property to its owners on any terms whatever, then a treaty would be necessary to define these conditions. But such a treaty, if it be desirable, would more properly follow a declaration of peace than accompany it. The gentleman from Texas would hardly propose now to begin war afresh for the purpose of recovering this $250,000,000, or whatever the amount may be that is due to our nationals. And if we are not intent on war, if, on the contrary, we would abhor the suggestion of it, then in God's name let us have peace. Let us proclaim the peace that is actual—the peace we have conquered; the peace from which we ourselves will benefit decisively and the whole human family will be blessed abundantly.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] asks, If we do not by a treaty provide for retaining this property to satisfy claims of our nationals for injuries inflicted by the enemy, what is it that we went to war for? I will tell him. We went to war because the German Empire, established on the conquest and dismemberment of France in 1870, built avowedly on blood and iron with a "war lord" for its chief, embodying the civilization of the camp, was found to imperil that civilization of the workshop of which this country is the most valuable fruit and the crowning glory.

For nearly 50 years the world had proceeded under the belief that these two civilizations might exist peaceably side by side, each pursuing the pathway of progress and prosperity according to its own opinions of right and justice without invading the rights or threatening the existence of the other. But the progress of the war, provoked by the war lord, soon convinced us that existence of a war lord is as incompatible with the peace of an industrial world as a mad dog is incompatible with the peace and order of an industrial community. And then this country—for its own safety, indeed, but also for the safety of the civilization which it embodies—rose and drove that mad dog from the face of the world which he had so grievously disturbed and chained him up in isolation, where he is impotent. That is why we went into the war. We went into it to overthrow that system of militarism and imperialism which threatened the safety of Christian civilization. And now that the system of blood and terror against which we took up arms has been overthrown, destroyed finally and irretrievably; now that its ruins will no longer be suffered to encumber the earth which it had oppressed, why should we not proclaim gladly, proudly, reverently, gratefully, that the greatest crusade in all history has been crowned with complete success by American valor on the battle field and by American wisdom in the council chamber; that the justice which Abraham Lincoln made supreme in America has been made through the statesmanship of Woodrow Wilson and the leadership of the American Nation supreme throughout the whole world. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. By the rule the previous question is ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. On Saturday the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], my colleague, made an application to the Speaker, who was then in the chair, for leave to address the House for 15 minutes outside of the set time. The colloquy will be found on page 2460 of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair remembers the incident. It is not necessary to read it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I desire to ask the Speaker if the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] that the time be extended to 4.45 o'clock p. m. did not act as a reservation upon the request of the gentleman from New York, and thereby automatically postpone the time of voting until 4.45?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it did not.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. My contribution to this discussion will be to call attention to the almost unanimous failure of the disputants to agree on what this resolution should be called or what will be its effect. The general impression seems to have prevailed up to this very minute that it is a resolution declaring peace, or a resolution making peace. The orators on both sides seem to have held it to be either one or the other.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it is neither one nor the other. If it were in either category, I would find great difficulty in justifying it. The speakers on both sides have failed—I say it with all due modesty—to note the distinction between—

1. Making peace;
2. Declaring peace; and
3. Stating that peace exists.

Making peace implies making a treaty. This resolution does not do that.

Declaring peace is peculiarly and solely the function and the explicit right of the President under the Constitution.

Stating that peace exists is the action that Congress is now called upon to perform. When that announcement is made the President, with that as his sanction, will, no doubt, issue a proclamation officially fixing the termination of the war.

It can not be justly claimed that the act of Congress called for in this resolution constitutes an invasion of the President's prerogatives, and still less an invasion of the prerogatives of the Senate, which is a part of the treaty-making power. This resolution originated in the Senate, and the fact that the Senate sends it over here for our consideration shows that that body waives exclusive jurisdiction over the subject matter.

The existence of peace is a question of fact. It may be brought about by treaty, but it may also be reached in other ways.

Writers of international law agree that a state of war may be ended in three ways—namely, by cessation of hostilities, by treaty, and by subjugation.

Two of these conditions exist in respect to the World War—warfare has ceased and our adversaries have been conquered. The making of the treaty alone remains unfinished, and that, according to the highest authority, is not indispensible to the establishment of peace.

Surely, then, no one can justly say that a declaration by Congress that the war is at an end can possibly trespass upon the President's authority. It is merely a declaration of an indisputable fact. I presume the President could declare peace without this resolution, but the passage of the resolution will put the question as to the existence of war beyond the shadow of doubt. Peace exists. Why not say so?

When our Constitution was in process of formation in the Constitutional Convention it was suggested by Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, that the power of declaring peace be accorded to the National Congress. This proposition was voted down, and, I think, properly so.

It was then evidently recognized that peace can not be made by a mere declaration. The resolution before us does not declare peace, because peace already prevails by the existence of the two essential factors—cessation of hostilities and conquest of our adversaries.

This resolution merely puts into form and gives official recognition to an existing fact.

In order to grasp the distinction, let us assume that while war was in progress—that is, while hostilities were still going on and the conflict was in doubt—a resolution was offered declaring peace with our adversary. That would be inimical to our Constitution, because that would be making peace, which only the President and the Senate can do. But when peace actually comes in due course by the cessation of hostilities and the conquest of our adversaries, Congress can not violate our Constitution or trespass on presidential prerogatives by making a formal acknowledgment of the fact that the war is at an end.

Objection is made that the reservation of our rights in the treaty of Versailles is unnecessary. At first I was inclined to agree to this proposition, and reasoned that if we have any rights in the treaty we would come into them as a matter of course upon the signing of the treaty. But the trouble is that there is a possibility that the treaty will never be signed. In that eventuality, what is to become of the rights conserved to us? Surely, if we do not give some indication that we are anxious to maintain those rights, it is manifest that the allied powers might very reasonably infer that we intended to abandon or waive them. This would be a very serious misfortune. The reservations that are objected to therefore assume a supreme importance. I doubt whether I would vote for the resolution unless those reservations were preserved.

The rights conceded to us under the treaty are firmly embedded in it. Germany has recognized them by solemn compact entered into with all of the allied Governments; and the United States, as an associate nation, named in that treaty, have an inchoate title to those rights—the only missing link in the chain of title being that we have not taken possession of them by signing the treaty.

We are entitled to claim those rights; and it is perfectly proper for us, in order to avoid all misunderstandings, to assert that we reserve them, meaning thereby that we will ultimately claim them. In the meantime the method of claiming them will be left to the Executive, in whose hands the treaty-making power is vested.

There would be danger in simply declaring that the war was at an end without reference to the rights which were conserved for us by the allied powers in the provisions of the treaty. If we omitted that reservation the world would say that we deserted our allies and waived the rights they secured for us in the treaty of Versailles and propose to make a separate peace, utterly disregarding the treaty already made.

I do not fear in the slightest that our passage of this resolution will be deemed an invasion of the President's treaty-making power. In the first place, as I understand it, he invites this action, and we ought to welcome the invitation.

The treaty-making power has remained in the hands of the President and the Senate only through the survival of ancient prejudice. It is a relic of times when sovereigns claimed the sole right to declare war and make peace. Even monarchies have abandoned that custom, and in Engand, France, and Italy treaties are ratified to-day by both chambers of their Parliament conjointly. The Versailles treaty was so ratified. A few days ago the French Chamber of Deputies ratified the treaty with Hungary.

It is time for the United States to come up abreast of the times and give the lower House an equal say in the making of treaties.

In passing, let me say that both in the last and in the present session of Congress I introduced a constitutional amendment to that effect, and I am glad of the opportunity afforded by this discussion to invite your attention to the proposal, which I trust in calm deliberation will merit your approbation.

Two years and seven months have elapsed since armistice day passed into history. The original combatants have ceased the gigantic struggle, but nations are still torn with strife and dissension. Fear, hate, jealousy, and greed still rule, and the millennium, which a weary world reaches out to grasp in joyous expectation, is now enshrouded in clouds and darkness beyond the distant horizon.

While our own country has been fortunately vouchsafed freedom from internal dissension, nevertheless our commerce and industries remain in confusion. We have had thrust upon our shoulders, as our share of the Great War, a debt unprecedented in the world's history, and our people are enduring serious distress.

Unemployment has increased and profiteering still goes on as though we were in the midst of war. Economic questions confront us and the intellect of the country is struggling to attain the solution of the problems before us.

Realizing fully this situation, the paramount question of the hour is how we shall return to prewar conditions. Manifestly, the first step which wisdom dictates is to make an official pronouncement that, so far as we are concerned, the war is at an end.

The reasons for this are many. In the first place, followed, as it will be, by the President's proclamation officially fixing the termination of the war, this resolution will mean the immediate cessation of the operation of war-time laws, upon whose existence so many injustices are predicated. It will remove the last shred and patch of them. But, better than all else, it will accustom us to think in terms of peace.

We will be able to appoint diplomatic and consular officers to represent us in the countries with which we have been at war, instead of intrusting our commercial relations to the consular representatives of rival nations. And with that will come a return to normal trade relations. We will be able to obtain the return of the property of our citizens seized during the war under laws similar to our alien property act, and will be able to arrive at a prompt settlement of the claims of our citizens for the damage inflicted upon them by our late enemies.

At the present time our position is anomalous. While apparently at peace, we are technically at war, and a thousand and one matters which depend upon the official conclusion of the war remain unsettled and undetermined.

For those reasons I am in favor of this resolution.

It would not be patriotic on the part of the minority, in my opinion, to oppose a return to prewar conditions simply because the proposition is fostered by our political antagonists or because it is in a form which we may not like. If they think they can close the war with such a resolution, and we believe they can not, nevertheless, vote with them, and I might add, "God speed them."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I think all gentlemen who did not have the opportunity to speak ought to have leave to extend their remarks, if they desire to do so, rather than those favored few only who had the privilege of speaking. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

UMI

Under the rule, the previous question is ordered; and the vote first comes on the amendment offered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to substitute their resolution for the Senate resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. At the proper time the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended resolution.

The amended resolution was read the third time.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FLOOD moves to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to that committee to forthwith report the joint resolution back to the House with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, requested and authorized to enter into negotiations with the Government of Germany and her allies and with the powers associated with the United States in the European War with a view to concluding a settlement of all controversies between the United States and Germany and her allies, and to conclude, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, any and all international acts or agreements necessary to reach a definite adjustment with all of the powers engaged in the European War in respect to any questions or controversies relating to the conflict.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. The point of order is that this is a motion to recommit offered to a resolution declaring the end of a state of war. The motion to recommit is not germane, because it proposes to enter upon negotiations between the United States and the Central Powers. It bears no relation whatever, as I caught the motion as it was being read, to the theory on which both the Knox resolution, so called, and the Porter resolution are based. It also either authorizes or instructs the President to negotiate a treaty, which, of course, is entirely outside of the four corners of either the Senate or the House form of this Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the resolution is to bring about peace, and the amendment to it is a proposition requesting the President to proceed to negotiate that peace.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will hear me, the motion to recommit has no relevancy whatever to the matter before the House.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, that is all I care to say. I think it is germane.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the House can pass a resolution instructing the President to negotiate a treaty with any power?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, the House has done things similar to that dozens of times.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state one instance where the House has ever done that?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, but the House has passed resolution after resolution authorizing and requesting the President to appoint commissions to negotiate treaties.

Mr. WALSH. But they did not direct him, as this resolution does.

Mr. FLOOD. This is a proposition similar to those, absolutely. This is simply a proposition requesting the President to appoint negotiators to negotiate the terms of peace, and the House has passed such resolutions; Congress has passed those resolutions. The fact is that Congress has passed a law prohibiting the President from appointing those commissioners without the authority of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does this resolution employ the word "instruct"?

Mr. FLOOD. No; "to authorize"—in the very language of the statute. The statute provides that the President shall be authorized to do it by act of Congress. The only question I thought was raised about this is its germaneness, and it seems to me it is germane.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, may I add a word to what I said before?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that this motion requests and authorizes the President to enter into negotiations with Germany. That is entirely outside of and irrelevant to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER]. Then the motion to recommit authorizes the President to enter into negotiations not only with Germany but also with her allies. Germany had various allies. The only ally contemplated in the Porter resolution or in the Knox resolution is Austria-Hungary; so that the language here, which necessarily includes Turkey and Bulgaria, is well beyond anything that has been proposed either in the Senate or in the House.

In the next place, the motion to recommit proposes to authorize the President to enter into negotiations with the powers associated with the United States in the war—a suggestion entirely undreamed of in the resolution either in its Senate form or in its House form.

Again, it proposes that there shall be made in these negotiations a settlement of all controversies between Germany and the allied and associated powers. Obviously this is far broader than the House resolution, and in every way inconsistent with its provisions.

The Speaker should bear in mind that the substance of this resolution now before the House is contained in three lines, "That the state of war is hereby declared to be at an end," and so forth. The second paragraph or section simply reserves our rights and preserves the status quo.

Mr. FLOOD. Does the gentleman contend that my amendment is broader in its scope than the Senate resolution?

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, it is infinitely broader. I tried to point out some of the respects in which it is broader.

Mr. FLOOD. I thought you said the Senate resolution.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman's motion goes far beyond both the Senate and the House resolution in the respects to which I have alluded.

Mr. FLOOD. I can amend that in respect to Austria-Hungary.

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, that is not the only trouble. From the first line to the last this suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia is not germane to the resolution which is pending before the House.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me a moment?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. I think the Speaker will recognize the fact that the proponents of the pending resolution seek to bring about a technical as well as a peace in fact between the United States and the German Government, and that the resolution, judged both by its terms, especially the concluding part of it, and the arguments of gentlemen in support of it, seeks to save every right, and, of course, they argue that that will leave the final adjustment and recognition of those rights to the usual and proper method by which a state of war may be finished, that is, by a treaty made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] offers to recommit, and the fact that he undertakes to adjust by treaty certain rights and "all those matters in controversy" does not broaden what the gentlemen say their resolution covers. It specifically seeks to reserve all rights. The only thing, it occurs to me, that the Speaker has to consider is this: A resolution is offered and considered to end the war by congressional resolution. The minority contend that Congress has not the power, but that the treaty-making power is vested in the President alone acting by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The proponents of the resolution admit that war can and is usually ended by treaty, but that Congress has jurisdiction and power also. Now, as I started to say, the only question that the Speaker has to decide is this, and frankly I am not clear about it in my own mind, but I want to offer it as a suggestion to the Speaker: Is it germane to the resolution that proposes to exercise the alleged legislative power of the House to offer as a substitute by way of the motion to recommit a resolution to request and authorize the President to conclude peace and end the war by a treaty? The proponents of the resolution admit the technical state of war may be ended by either method. Is the one proposal to end war germane to the other?

Now, it occurs to me that that is the only question. Upon that I offer this suggestion to the Speaker, that we are considering the question of peace. The major proposition is not the particular agency or method by which we will bring about an immediate peace, but it is to bring about peace. It is contended by this side that the proper, constitutional way to do it is along the beaten path of negotiation by the President of a treaty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is contended by the proponents of the proposition that it is not only lawful under the Constitution but that it is practicable and advisable to bring about peace by congressional action. That is the issue between the majority and minority. I remind the Speaker that the object of the motion to recommit is to enable the minority to have their position presented and voted upon. But, Mr. Speaker, if you accept the narrow interpretation, as you are urged to do, then you will defeat that right. The issue is clear: How to bring about peace. Two methods are proposed, but the subject matter is peace, and both methods are germane to the substantial result sought—that is, peace. They say, "Why quibble about the matter?" If that is true, the proponents of the Flood method of bringing about peace have a right to go on record in favor of that, whether you agree to it or not; and I submit that under the philosophy of the rule providing for a motion to recommit the amendment is not only germane, but that it is the only way by which the minority can exercise the right preserved to them by the rule to have its view presented and voted on. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair is prepared to rule, I do not wish to take up any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.
